PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 82d CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1951

The 3d day of January being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the first session of the Eighty-second Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

ALBEN W. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, whose approval we seek above the hollow applause of men, with the unwritten record of a new session open before us we would make the first entry "In the beginning God," as with contrite hearts we offer the prayer that all the deliberations of this historic Chamber may be begun, continued and ended in Thee. In a world where the very foundations seem to be shaken and the mad fury of battle this very day assails our senses and tears our hearts, we cherish this hushed and hallowed moment which so long ago the founding fathers set apart as an altar of prayer at the day's beginning.

Grant that those who by the people's choice have been called to high places of state in this fateful day, conscious of the great tradition in which they stand, assuming responsibilities as heavy as the servants of the Commonwealth have ever borne, may be filled with Thy spirit, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of Thee. On this significant day of beginnings like the sound of a great amen may there ascend from every Member of this legislative body, upon which are the eyes of the world, the solemn prayer: "So help me, God!" We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first order of business is the administration of the oath of office to the newly elected Senators. Their names will be called in alphabetical order in groups of four and as their names are called they will proceed to the rostrum where the oath will be administered.

The legislative clerk (Edward E. Mansur, Jr.) called the names of Mr. AIKEN, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. BUTLER of Maryland, and Mr. CAPEHART.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the oath required by the Constitution and prescribed by law is administered to Mr. JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER as a Senator from the State of Maryland for the term beginning January 3, 1951, such action shall be deemed to be without prejudice either to him or to the constitutional right or power of the Senate to take any action it may subsequently deem proper, pending the outcome of the investigation now being made by the Committee on Rules and Administration through a subcommittee into the 1950 election in said State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senators whose names have been called will come forward and take the oath of office.

Mr. AIKEN, escorted by Mr. FLANDERS, Mr. BENNETT, escorted by Mr. WATKINS, Mr. BUTLER of Maryland, escorted by Mr. O'CONOR, and Mr. CAPEHART, escorted by Mr. JENNER, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. CARLSON, Mr. CASE, Mr. CLEMENTS, and Mr. DIRKSEN.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. CHAPMAN, and Mr. DOUGLAS, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. DUFF, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. HENNINGS.

These Senators (with the exception of Mr. DUFF), escorted by Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. MCFARLAND, and Mr. KEM, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. HILL, Mr. HOEY, and Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. GILLETTE, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. SMITH of North Carolina, and Mr. MAYBANK, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. LONG, Mr. MAGNUSON, and Mr. MCCARRAN.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. IVES, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. MALONE, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. MCMAHON, Mr. MILLIKIN, Mr. MONRONEY, and Mr. MORSE.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. BENTON, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. KERR, and Mr. CORDON, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. NIXON, Mr. SMATHERS, Mr. TAFT, and Mr. TOBEY.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. KNOWLAND, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. BRICKER, and Mr. BRIDGES, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. WELKER, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. YOUNG.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. MCCARTHY, and Mr. LANGER, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

RESUMPTION OF SENATE SESSIONS IN SENATE CHAMBER

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks this is not an inappropriate time to invite the attention of Senators and their guests to what the Chair regards as an important historic event, namely, the return of the Senate to this Chamber.

Ninety-two years ago this month the United States Senate moved from the Chamber which it had previously occupied into this new wing of the Capitol, and the House of Representatives moved from what is now Statuary Hall into its new Chamber.

Twice within the life of the Eighty-first Congress the Senate, because of repairs which were being made to this Chamber, has had to move out of this Chamber into its old Chamber, which for many years had been occupied by the Supreme Court.

The Chair would like to congratulate the Architect of the Capitol and all his associates, as well as the committees of the Senate and of the House for the magnificent work they have done in the remodeling of this Chamber of the United States Senate.

Here also in connection with the old Chamber were hammered out the patterns of our institutions, our liberties, and our constitutional rights. Here many historic debates took place from 1859 until the present time. Debates in this Chamber and in the corresponding Chamber at the other end of the Capitol made American history.

It seems to me that now when we return to this Chamber, which has been occupied for nearly a century by the Senate of the United States, we can very well be imbued with a new spirit typified and symbolized by the new appearance and the new conveniences not only on the floor, but in the galleries for the benefit of our friends and guests.

The Chair may be pardoned, he hopes, if he expresses the conviction and the belief that from this new atmosphere here we may take new courage and a new spirit of cooperation, and the determination that, without regard to differences which must exist among strong men with deep convictions, which differences must be expressed here if we are to maintain the freedom of debate, we may conduct ourselves as should the greatest legislative body in the world, the last forum of free debate and free consideration among legislative bodies; that in this critical time in our history and in the history of the world, we may here highly resolve, in the language of Lincoln at Gettysburg, that liberty shall not perish from the earth, that we shall continue to be a nation "of the people, by the people, for the people," and that through our cooperation and our unselfish services here in behalf of our people we may set for all the world an example which may bring peace and happiness and contentment to all mankind. [Applause.]

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. McFARLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Ecton	Johnston, S. C.

Robertson	Stennis	Young
Russell	Taft

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. McFARLAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 1), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. McFARLAND and Mr. WHERRY the committee on the part of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE

Mr. WHERRY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 2), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 3), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian unless otherwise ordered.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I wish to ask unanimous consent that until further notice my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] may be excused from attending the sessions of the Senate, because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I also wish to ask such unanimous consent. I wish to make the same request today that I made yesterday, in behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], namely, that he be excused from attending the sessions of the Senate until January 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS TO FRIDAY

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, it has been the custom and the uniform practice for many years that the Senate not transact any business prior to the delivery by the President of the United States of his address on the state of the Union. I therefore move that the Senate now stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator by unanimous consent permit me to address a question to him before the motion is put?

Mr. McFARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the motion mean that, if it is agreed to, no business of any kind—such as speeches, the introduction of bills, or anything of that sort—will be transacted on Friday, either?

Mr. McFARLAND. I think, as a courtesy to the President, we should not transact any business whatsoever, on Friday as well.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator think that is necessary, when the President has postponed his speech for an entire week? Formerly we always had the President's address the day after the Senate met.

As a matter of fact, no courtesy is involved, because in the House of Representatives there has always been the introduction of bills on the very first day they met.

Does the Senator think it is necessary to delay the business of the Senate for an entire week because the President is not able or willing at this time to deliver his state of the Union message?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I certainly believe it is desirable to follow the usual custom which has been uniformly practiced in the past. It is clear, I think, that no legislative time will be gained by the introduction of bills and resolutions today or Friday since the committees are not yet organized and will not be able to transact any legislative business prior to next Monday. While the interval is somewhat longer than on former occasions, there is nothing to be gained by breaking precedents now. I hope we will continue to follow precedents.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator realize that the President will then have delayed the whole action of this body by nearly a week by his failure to deliver his state of the Union message immediately, as he always has done heretofore, and as has been the custom? Furthermore, apparently the budget message, upon which much of the action of Congress must be based, is to be postponed until January 15, whereas we have often had urged upon us that we had to come back to special sessions and had to rush through many bills almost the day after they were introduced. Now we are asked to delay action by the Senate for almost 2 weeks, not only on legislative proposals, but also in the way of expressions of opinion by Members of the Senate on questions that are before the Senate of the United States and before the people of the country.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Ohio to the fact that the Senate was in session yesterday, and as a result there is legislation which is on the President's desk, awaiting his consideration. Moreover, the duties of the President in these times of crisis are great, and require a great deal of his time.

Equally important, I already have pointed out that the Senate committee memberships have not yet been appointed, and it is obvious the Senate cannot transact any legislative business until the respective committees have been manned and are able to function. Under these circumstances it seems clear that the introduction of bills and resolutions prior to next Monday does not in any way affect the timetable of Senate operations.

I certainly think this is a courtesy which should be extended to the President of the United States. We should not break the custom which has prevailed for many years, since no time will be lost.

Mr. President, I shall renew my motion.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Arizona that heretofore it has not been customary to make a motion or to ask unanimous consent for that purpose. The Chair has usually assumed that Senators would accord to the President the courtesy of not introducing bills until after the President had delivered his message to the joint session of the two Houses.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, my motion was that the Senate stand in recess until Friday, but I have withheld the motion temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the Senator from Arizona withheld his motion. Does he now renew it?

Mr. McFARLAND. First, I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I ask the Senator to yield to me, only to permit me to ask a brief question: Can the Senator from Arizona tell the Senate now whether by next Monday or Tuesday the committees will have been appointed so that legislative matters can be taken up after the President delivers his annual message?

Mr. McFARLAND. We shall act with due diligence in seeing that the committees are appointed, so that there will not be any more delay than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator feel that the question of having discussions on the floor of the Senate comes under the heading of the transaction of business?

Mr. McFARLAND. I would answer the distinguished Senator in this way: I think it would be most discourteous to the President of the United States for the Senate to engage in debate prior to the delivery of the President's message.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would not the Senator feel that, in view of the delay, no custom is involved, and that possibly if we were to follow the Senator's suggestion, a precedent would be established as a consequence of which future Presidents might delay even more indefinitely the delivery of their State of the Union message? Should we not consider the matter carefully before establishing the precedent of extending the time?

Mr. McFARLAND. My answer to the Senator's question is that none of us should regard this as an unusual delay in view of the circumstances. I have said before that the problems confronting the President are great. We were in session yesterday. The President has important proposed legislation upon his desk. I do not regard waiting until Monday as an unusual delay.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. It is not true, however, that this is not a question of courtesy, because the House of Representatives has never engaged in the custom to which reference has been made. The House of Representatives has always acted on the first day of the session; Members of the House have introduced bills on the first day of the session, and have gone ahead with business, without waiting for the delivery of the President's message.

So it seems to me to be merely a matter of custom.

I suggest to the Senator that the President is the one who has changed the custom, by postponing his state of the Union message to a time which will keep the Senate inactive in the interval, and, regardless of what is said, will delay the ultimate action of the Senate on many measures because of his delay.

Mr. McFARLAND. The distinguished Senator from Ohio is entitled to his opinion, and I respect it. He is correct in alluding to the proposed procedure as a custom, and I am merely suggesting that we follow precedent. I hope, therefore, he will not insist upon objecting to the first request which is being made on the opening day of the new Congress.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I do not object at all to having the Senate take a recess to Friday, but on Friday I propose to raise the question again.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order to permit an insertion to be made in the RECORD?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, the Senate will meet on Friday, and the Senator from Ohio has stated that he again will raise the question on Friday.

Therefore, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until Friday next, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Friday, January 5, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1951

This being the day fixed by the twentieth amendment of the Constitution for the annual meeting of the Congress of the United States, the Members of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-second Congress met in their Hall, and at 12 o'clock noon were called to order by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, Hon. Ralph R. Roberts.

The Chaplain of the Eighty-first Congress, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou eternal God, in this first meeting of our Eighty-second Congress, we are again reverently approaching Thy throne of grace and mercy, of majesty and power, through the old and familiar way of prayer which is never closed to those who come with a humble spirit and a contrite heart.

We thank Thee for our beloved country, conceived in sacrifice, dedicated to Thy glory, and consecrated to the service of all mankind. May we now prize our Nation more highly as we think of our fellow citizens out on the fields of battle defending our liberties to the utmost.

We pray that our President, our Speaker, and all the Members of this legislative body, who have been entrusted with the high vocation of leadership in the affairs of government, may be guided by Thy divine spirit in all their deliberations and decisions as they seek to lead struggling humanity out of the night of darkness into the radiant light of a better day.

Grant that daily we may enter into counsel with the God of all wisdom, holding our own desires and wishes in abeyance until Thou dost declare Thy will and performing our duties with a pure and steadfast devotion.

May it be the goal of all our aspirations and endeavors to magnify Thy great and holy name and to hasten the coming of that blessed day when peace shall be the glorious possession of all the members of the human family and they shall walk together in the spirit of the Prince of Peace.

Wilt Thou hear us as we bow in adoration and unite in offering unto Thee the prayer of our Lord and Saviour:

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever.

Amen.

ROLL CALL BY STATES

The CLERK. Representatives-elect, this is the day fixed by the Constitution for the meeting of the Eighty-second Congress. Certificates of election covering 434 seats in the Eighty-second Congress have been received by the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-first Congress, and the names of those persons whose credentials show that they were regularly elected as Representatives in accordance with the laws of their respective States or of the United States will be called. As the roll is called, following the alphabetical order of the States beginning with the State of Alabama, Representatives-elect will please answer to their names to determine whether a quorum is present.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll by States, and the following Representatives-elect answered to their names:

The CLERK. The roll call discloses that 426 Members-elect have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Clerk will state that credentials, regular in form, have been received showing the election of EDWARD L. BARTLETT as Delegate from the Territory of Alaska, and of JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON as Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

The CLERK. The next order of business is the election of a Speaker of the House of Representatives. Nominations are now in order.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Clerk, as chairman of the Democratic caucus, I am directed by the unanimous vote of that caucus to present for election to the office of Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-second Congress the name of Hon. SAM RAYBURN, a Representative-elect from the State of Texas.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Clerk, by direction, and by unanimous vote of the Republican conference representing the minority of this House, I have the honor to nominate for Speaker of the House of Representatives the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., a Representative-elect from the State of Massachusetts to the Eighty-second Congress.

The CLERK. The Honorable SAM RAYBURN, a Representative-elect from the State of Texas, and the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., a Representative-elect from the State of Massachusetts, have been placed in nomination. Are there further nominations?

There being no further nominations, the Clerk will appoint the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. KELLY], the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT], and the gentleman from California [Mr. ALLEN] to act as tellers.

The roll will now be called and those responding will indicate by surname the nominee of their choice.

The tellers will please take their places at the desk in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

The tellers having taken their places, the House proceeded to vote for Speaker.

The following is the result of the vote:

NOT VOTING—8

Angell	Hoffman, Mich.	Mansfield
Crosser	Horan	O'Konski

The CLERK. The tellers agree in their tally. The total number of votes cast is 426, of which the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, of Texas, received 231, and the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., of Massachusetts, received 192; present, 3.

Therefore, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, a Representative-elect from the State of Texas is duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Eighty-second Congress.

The Clerk appoints the following committee to escort the Speaker-elect to the chair: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. My colleagues, it is a privilege for me to stand on this exalted platform even if it is only for a few moments. It is one of the compensations of a defeated candidate; he is permitted to share in the reflected glory of the victor. I admit that several months ago I had ideas I might occupy this position a little longer than I am going to today; the decision has been otherwise, however, and I have no regrets. But, seriously, it is a happy place assigned to me.

Ten years ago the Members of this House elected a Speaker. He has served with one interruption, which I might say with the indulgence of the Speaker, was a happy interlude. He has now been chosen for a sixth term. On January 30 of this year he will have served as Speaker of the House longer than any other man in American history. The record previously was held by that able, distinguished, and most notable son of Kentucky, Henry Clay. On January 30 our Speaker will have exceeded his tenure of office.

One cannot be elected Speaker for all that period of time without being a fine character, a man of extraordinary ability, great fairness, and a parliamentarian par excellence. Those are virtues which we have in our Speaker. In this hour of confusion, this hour of uncertainty when none of us knows what the future has ahead, we have a man who has the courage; we have a man who has the firmness to do that which is right, to the end that our country may emerge a better country. We are sometimes misunderstood by our friends in other countries. We fight, we debate, we vote, and then we settle the question. They cannot understand that these are the practical principles that make for a democracy, a republic. They cannot see either that when our fight is over, that when we reach a decision, we are all united, we are all Americans with but one thought: To make America a better land for all our people.

So, ladies and gentlemen, without further ado, it gives me great pleasure to present to you your Speaker and my Speaker, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, of Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. MARTIN, my beloved colleague and predecessor in this position for a time, and Members of the United States House of Representatives: I should be less than human if the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts did not touch me deeply, or if your action here today renewing your confidence in me did not sink deeply into an appreciative soul. I shall never cease to hold in grateful memory the favor of my colleagues on the Democratic side and the courtesy, the kindness, and the helpfulness of my colleagues on the Republican side in the trying days in which I have occupied this position, sometimes of terrible responsibility.

I come back to you today to renew the pledge that I have made to you many times before: That I will do my best to conduct the affairs of this office in the way that may be pleasing to you and pleasing to my countrymen.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts suggested, we live in troubled days. In my deliberate opinion, looking around the earth, everyone now living in any democracy, where freedom and liberty still exist, live in the most dangerous time they ever lived in or anyone ever lived in since the foundation of this Republic. So it behooves us to lay aside little differences, lay aside all criticism that is not constructive, that is not helpful, and all of us join and pledge ourselves that this, the greatest, the freest and the finest government that ever existed upon the face of the earth shall be strong enough to maintain its liberty and its security.

I trust in these times that there will not be too many domestic issues that will divide us and take our minds and our effort away from the great problems that face us in the world today. We live in a world where people live closer together than they ever lived before. Distances amount to little. There was a time when we boasted that we had two great friends, the Atlantic Ocean and the Pacific Ocean. During our last war they became hazardous things. And let me say to you it matters not where other counsel may come from, I feel that I know the United States of America cannot wrap two oceans around it and stay secure, safe, and free.

We are a part of this world and we must remain that. This great democracy, challenged with the leadership of the world that we have accepted and that we must have accepted, is the leader of the democracies of the world, the pattern for free peoples the earth around, and unless we perform our duties and our mission in the days to come I fear we will have a world that will not be a fit place for men and women and children to live in.

So my efforts shall be to join with all patriotic men and women in this House, and they are all patriotic men and women, devoted to the high purposes and to the great principles upon which this democracy was founded, to do the things that will make us so strong that international desperados and despots will fear to get in our path. This we must do if civilization itself is to survive.

During the months ahead I shall work with you, every one of you, to make this come true so that one day again we may return to an enduring peace that men and women will know what tomorrow will bring. From the bottom of a grateful heart I again thank you.

I am now ready to take the oath of office and I will ask my distinguished friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], dean of the House, to administer the oath.

Mr. SABATH then administered the oath of office to Mr. RAYBURN.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS

The SPEAKER. According to a custom that was established a few years ago, I will now ask all the Members to rise and take the oath of office.

The Members and Delegates-elect rose, and the Speaker administered to them the oath of office.

AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER OATH TO ROBERT CROSSER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 1) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, Whereas ROBERT CROSSER, a Representative-elect from Ohio, from the Twenty-first District thereof, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker, or deputy named by him, be, and he is hereby, authorized to administer the oath of office to said ROBERT CROSSER at Bethesda, Md., and that the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said ROBERT CROSSER.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER OATH TO WILSON D. GILLETTE

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 2) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, Whereas WILSON D. GILLETTE, a Representative-elect from the State of Pennsylvania, from the Fourteenth District thereof, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker, or deputy named by him, be, and he is hereby, authorized to administer the oath of office to said WILSON D. GILLETTE at Towanda, Pa., and that the said oath, when administered as herein authorized, shall be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said WILSON D. GILLETTE.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the authority of House Resolution 2, Eighty-second Congress, the Chair appoints Capt. James L. Fisher, United States Navy, retired, justice of the peace of Standing Stone Township, Bradford County, Wysox, Pa., to administer the oath of office to the Honorable WILSON D. GILLETTE.

MAJORITY LEADER

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic caucus, pursuant to unanimous vote of that caucus, it is my happy privilege to announce the election of Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, as majority leader of the House for the Eighty-second Congress.

MINORITY LEADER

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Republican conference of the House, I am directed by that conference to officially notify the House that the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., of Massachusetts, has been selected as minority floor leader of the House.

ELECTION OF CLERK OF THE HOUSE, SERGEANT AT ARMS, DOORKEEPER, POSTMASTER, AND CHAPLAIN

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 3) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Ralph R. Roberts, of the State of Indiana, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;

That Joseph H. Callahan, of the State of Kentucky, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives;

That William M. Miller, of the State of Mississippi, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;

That Finis E. Scott, of the State of Tennessee, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives;

That Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., of the District of Columbia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be divided and that the vote on the election of the Chaplain be taken separately.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the election of Rev. Bernard Braskamp as Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

The question was taken; and Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., was elected Chaplain.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute resolution.

The Clerk read the substitute resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Irving W. Swanson, of the State of Wisconsin, be, and he is hereby chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;

That William F. Russell, of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives;

That Tom J. Kennamer, of the State of Missouri, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;

That Beecher Hess, of the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute resolution.

The substitute resolution was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The officers-elect presented themselves at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

NOTIFICATION TO SENATE OF ORGANIZATION OF HOUSE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 4) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas, has been elected Speaker; and Ralph R. Roberts, a citizen of the State of Indiana, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-second Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF THE ASSEMBLY OF THE CONGRESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 5) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with a committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints, as members of the committee on the part of the House to join a committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make, the following Members: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

CLERK DIRECTED TO INFORM THE PRESIDENT AS TO THE ELECTION OF THE SPEAKER AND THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 6) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to inform the President of the United States that the House of Representatives has elected SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas, Speaker, and Ralph R. Roberts, a citizen of the State of Indiana, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-second Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 1

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Senate Resolution 2

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 7) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-first Congress, together with all applicable provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, be, and they are hereby, adopted as the rules of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-second Congress.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the resolution I have just presented to the House for its consideration extends the rules under which the business of the House was conducted in the last Congress to the present one. It insures and protects every Member's right and privilege to go on record and vote for or against vital legislation.

I am of the opinion that the rules which prevailed in the Eighty-first Congress have worked well, have safeguarded the rights and interests of the several committees and their members, and have been for the best interests of our Nation. Some gentlemen who were opposed to the adoption of the rules in the Eighty-first Congress were under the impression that the Committee on Rules, of which I have the honor to be chairman, would be deprived of some of its rights and privileges.

May I state, having been a member of the Committee on Rules for 20 years, as well as chairman for 12 years, of what is claimed to be the most powerful committee of the House, that that committee functioned fairly well during the Eighty-first Congress notwithstanding the effectiveness of the 21-day discharge amendment to the rules, and there is no justification for reverting to the rules in effect during the Eightieth Congress.

The Committee on Rules, during the last Congress, reported a total of 240 bills, rules, and resolutions. For the information of the membership, here is what the Committee on Rules accomplished in the Eighty-first Congress:

During the first session 116 bills and resolutions were considered by the committee. Eighty-two rules were granted on general legislation. Nine House joint resolutions and Senate joint resolutions were granted rules. Fourteen resolutions providing investigatory power to standing committees of the House were reported favorably. Two resolutions providing for special investigating committees were reported favorably. One resolution creating a small-business committee was favorably reported. Two resolutions providing for recess and suspension of the rules were reported favorably. Four House concurrent resolutions were reported favorably. One resolution assigning delegates to various committees of the House was reported favorably. Only one rule was denied, that on the rivers and harbors flood-control bill.

During the second session, 99 House and Senate bills and resolutions were considered by the committee. Eighty-seven rules were granted on general legislation. Nine House resolutions were reported favorably. Three House joint resolutions were granted rules.

As stated previously, the grand total of bills and resolutions granted rules or were favorably reported is 214.

At the same time I wish to say that under the rules, as amended by the Eighty-first Congress, providing for the 21-day discharge rule the House had the privilege and the opportunity of voting on eight important bills reported favorably by legislative committees on which the Committee on Rules failed to act or denied rules thereon, namely, the rivers and harbors flood-control bill, the joint resolution providing for United States participation in international organizations, the bills providing statehood for Alaska and Hawaii, the National Science Foundation bill, the mining bill, the veterans' hospital bill, and the poll-tax bill.

Under leave granted me yesterday, I shall file with the House at a later date, a separate and complete report on the rules granted and the resolutions favorably reported by the Committee on Rules during the last Congress. The foregoing shows that under the rules of the Eighty-first Congress, which my resolution now seeks to continue in the Eighty-second Congress, when the Rules Committee failed to act, the committee chairman had the opportunity, the privilege, and the right to offer his own rule, under which rule these bills were acted upon by the House. Otherwise none of them could have been considered.

Consequently, I feel that the rules in effect during the Eighty-first Congress should be adopted, and that this resolution I have offered is proper, and in the best interests of legislative procedure.

I am of the opinion, in view of the fact that the Rules Committee was created as a policy committee, that it is the duty of the committee to seek to carry out the mandates of the House and to expedite legislation. It gives each and every chairman of a legislative committee, if he sees that the Rules Committee has failed to act on his bill, after considering it for weeks and months, the right to file his own rule for the course of the legislation. So, in the interest of the Members, in the interest of all legislative committees, I think the resolution before us should be adopted so we can continue to have orderly procedure and advance legislation that is recommended by the President and favorably reported to the House by the various committees. After all, Mr. Speaker, the President has certain duties to perform under the Constitution, namely, to recommend legislation to the Congress. Who is in a better position to recommend legislation than the President? I feel it is the duty of those of us in the majority to carry out the recommendation of the President as far as possible. The Rules Committee should carry out the wishes and desires of the majority, but unfortunately, as it is today, somehow or other, some of the gentlemen who belong to the Democratic Party, whose responsibility it is to carry out the program of the majority in power, do not work with their leaders, and, although we have a so-called majority on the Rules Committee here, it is only a paper majority. Unfortunately, frequently I have found myself in the minority on my committee. You may ask why? I answer that by saying because three of the Democratic members do not cooperate with the majority of the members but prefer to cooperate and deal with the Republican minority. In fact, only yesterday, or the day before, I am informed these three Democratic members of the Committee on Rules, elected by the Democrats as Democrats, were in conference with Republican leaders for the purpose of arranging for the defeat of the resolution I have presented here today, which provides for the continuance of the 21-day-discharge rule.

To what extent the Republicans have gone is, indeed, amazing, because I have it on good authority that some of the Republican liberal Members and new Members were clubbed into agreeing to vote against my resolution under the peril of not being considered for appointment to committees of their choice or for which they were best qualified. By this sort of action they are digging their own political graves.

History will repeat itself. Well do I recall the fight of the 25 progressive Republicans who joined with the Democratic forces in overthrowing "Cannonism" and in changing the rules of the House which permitted the consideration of legislation in the interest of the common people. They were derided and ridiculed by their Republican colleagues who legislated for the vested interests, yet in the ensuing election all of the 25 progressive Republicans were reelected and so many of their regular Republican colleagues who voted against the changing of the rules were defeated in such numbers as to bring about the election of a Democratic House.

Ever since I entered Congress I have fought for liberal rules providing for the conduct of business before this House. In fact, it was due to my resolution that Speaker Cannon, known as the czar, was shorn of his power to name all of the committees, which gave him absolute control of the House. Ever since, I have continued in my fight to safeguard the rights and privileges of Members to vote on bills that properly came before the House. The 21-day-discharge rule is in that direction because, as I have stated, when the Committee on Rules fails to act or acts adversely on a rule providing for the consideration of a bill, then the chairman of a legislative committee is empowered to file his own rule, thereby making it possible for the Members of the House to express themselves and to vote on legislation.

Being aware of the cooperation on the part of three Democratic members of the Committee on Rules with the Republican minority on the committee, and the prolonged fight to deny Members the right to vote on measures bottled up by the Committee on Rules, I fear that my resolution may not be adopted. However, I am satisfied that if that should occur, not only those who have entered into this unholy alliance but also those Members who will vote against my resolution will in the future regret their action, because the country and the press have approved of the 21-day discharge rule. The repeal of this liberalized rule will, as I have stated, tear down the rights of every Member.

It is to be regretted that this coalition uses its power to defeat liberal and progressive legislation, and that it invariably supports and votes for all legislation advocated by the vested interests, such as the infamous natural-gas bill, the tidelands oil bill, and the freight-rate basing-point bill.

This is proof, regardless of what the Republican leaders may say, that instead of having the interests of the people at heart, the special interests seem to be uppermost in their minds.

I shall not detain the House longer. There are quite a few others who wish to be heard on this resolution. However, I cannot conclude before I wish each and every one of you a Happy New Year. In addition to that, I want to congratulate the Speaker upon his reelection, and congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] upon his reelection as minority leader. I hope that both of them will be reelected often and many times to the same positions to which they have been elected today.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition on the resolution.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time and I do not yield to anyone to offer amendments. Under the rules I have 1 hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has an hour under his control. How much time does he yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SABATH. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, how about the minority? We still have certain privileges.

Mr. SABATH. I have assured the gentleman that he will receive a reasonable length of time.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. What is a reasonable length of time? Thirty minutes? Is not that the usual procedure in the House?

Mr. SABATH. I have explained to the gentleman, although I know that gentlemen on that side seem to be—and I regret it for they should not be—opposed to this legislation.

My time will be equally divided, evenly between those for and those against. So the gentleman will get sufficient time.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Under this division how much time is the gentleman going to let the minority have?

Mr. SABATH. Thirty minutes, divided, 15 minutes on the Democratic side and 15 minutes on the Republican side.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. The gentleman means that the minority will have only 15 minutes?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, if the gentleman needs a little more time I may be able to find a little for him; he knows I am always fair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is stating that he will yield the opposition 30 minutes; that is what he is stating, but some of the opposition seems to be over on the right.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Under whose control?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has control of the time.

Mr. SABATH. May I say that I had a conference with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], and with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] yesterday. I presume that is the opposition. So to you gentlemen combined I will grant and yield the 30 minutes; and the majority, those that are for the resolution, will also have only 30 minutes, no more; therefore, it will be evenly divided, honestly, fairly, squarely divided.

Mr. COX. Am I recognized, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 5 minutes for debate.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia was recognized for debate only.

Mr. COX. Then, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish recognition at this time.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. Is it not in order for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] or some other Member to offer a substitute for this resolution?

The SPEAKER. Not in the time of the gentleman from Illinois unless he yields for that purpose.

Mr. RANKIN. He is taking all the time; he is getting the entire hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is the mover of the resolution and has control of the time. The gentleman from Illinois, as is usual, has offered the resolution, and he was recognized for an hour, and that hour is under his control. He yielded for debate only.

Mr. COX. If I may be permitted, then, to speak for the contenders for change, the gentleman from Illinois may have the entire hour and we will use our time on the substitute resolution that I will offer in the event that the previous question is voted down.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I wish to understand the parliamentary situation at the moment.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will use his time——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts desires to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The gentleman from Massachusetts will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the legislative situation, it is that any Member who has a resolution, either the gentleman from Georgia or anyone else, may not offer the resolution until the previous question is voted down.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is moved and is voted down.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that in 1945, at the beginning of the Seventy-ninth Congress, we had this issue here when I offered my amendment creating the Committee on Un-American Activities; it was ruled in order. I think the gentleman from Georgia has the right to offer an amendment or a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so unless the gentleman from Illinois yields for an amendment or the previous question is voted down.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] for debate only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] is recognized for 5 minutes for debate.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Just a moment ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] told me 15 minutes. Is he going to yield me any time that I may yield in my own right?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] does not have any time except what has been yielded to him.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] 30 minutes, if he desires to yield time, but to be used for debate only.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I will accept it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I might require.

Mr. Speaker, just a few minutes ago I took the oath of office as a Member of this House for the tenth time. During most of those years I served as a member of the Rules Committee—14 years to be exact. I can truthfully say that during the past 2 years under rules adopted by the Eighty-first Congress there has been much more confusion in the Rules Committee than ever before. I think and believe this body will change them.

I want to mention briefly to the new Members here today the action of the Eightieth Congress and preceding Congresses as compared to the action of the Eighty-first Congress. During the Eightieth Congress I was chairman of the Rules Committee. I invited the attention of the members of the Rules Committee in session to the standing committees of the House which approved bills appropriating at least $20,000,000,000 more than the revenue estimated to be received by the Government in those 2 years.

We felt that something should be done about it, that the budget must be balanced even though it was necessary to hold up several bills with considerable merit. As a result of the rules adopted by the Eightieth Congress that Congress saved the taxpayers considerable money and for the first time in 18 years the income of the Federal Government was larger than its outgo. In other words, since 1933 it was the first Congress that balanced the budget. So I say to you that if you are interested in cutting down nondefense spending you should vote down the previous question.

Under the rule adopted by the Eighty-first Congress what happened? A few moments ago we heard our beloved Speaker mention the great responsibilities that have been his. We all admit that. What has happened under this rule? Many more great responsibilities have been added to the Speaker's burden. There is no question but what the Speaker of this House has taken unto himself the responsibilities of the Rules Committee. During the Eighty-first Congress he had more responsibilities and power than Uncle Joe Cannon had during a half century of work in this Congress.

You will be told that the Rules Committee will try to bottle up legislation. During the Eighty-first Congress there was considerable confusion in the Rules Committee. There were very few meetings of the Rules Committee in which it was not necessary to go out and put additional responsibilities on the Speaker. Now to you new Members I will say this: There are two ways that the membership of this House can get bills to the floor for final determination. It will be stated that we are trying to take away from you the right to act on meritorious bills. You have the right to sign the discharge petition, which takes effect when 218 names appear thereon, and on Calendar Wednesday you also have the right to be recognized, so the Rules Committee does not have absolute power on any bills. The majority of the membership can bring any bill on the floor of the House for action.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that when the previous question is moved, that it is voted down.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] yielded 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN]. He has now addressed the House. Is it in order now for me to ask him to yield to me in order that I may speak in the 30 minutes granted to him by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think so.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALLECK. In view of the granting of the time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], is it possible for him to grant time of the 30 minutes that has not been used by him?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say so.

Mr. SABATH. May I say this: I have promised three different gentlemen on your side some time, and I promised four gentlemen on this side some time. I hope that there will be no misunderstanding and that you will have sufficient time as well as those Members that have sought to obtain time heretofore.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the gentleman has promised to yield some time to those who are against the change. I, as one of those, should prefer to get it from the Republican side. Since the gentleman has yielded 30 minutes of his time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], I understand from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] that I may get such time as I think reasonable from him on that score.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois this question. I am not going to yield half of my time to people over here in sympathy with the resolution, unless the gentleman gives some of his time to those on our side.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I am going to do.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. The gentleman may then go ahead, and I will act accordingly.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER].

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I think that this House, on the first day of the session, is being called upon to make what will be a historic decision. That being true I think it appropriate to remind this House that in the early days of the Republic we did not need a Committee on Rules. There were fewer Members, less business, and the then Speaker was able to control the legislation for the good of the country. It was found, as we expanded, that we needed a Committee on Rules, and it was set up, Mr. Speaker, only for the purpose of regulating the traffic and the business of the House so we could have orderly and regular procedure. To legislative committees of the House were given the authority to pass on the merits of any legislation submitted by the President or by any Members of the House. The legislative committees took time to study it, and then it was referred to the Committee on Rules so that we could have orderly consideration on the floor of the House. But, as time developed, the Committee on Rules wandered away from its original purpose. It started not to regulate the flow of legislation to the floor of the House; it started to block legislation. But, that is not the worst thing that the Committee on Rules developed into the habit of doing.

It developed a habit of studying legislation that had been studied for maybe weeks or months by the legislative committees. The committee began to dissect that legislation and make up their own minds as to whether or not it was good legislation. Many a chairman of a legislative committee which had considered legislation for months and months was ordered by the Committee on Rules to change the provisions of legislation before a rule would be granted. That was a denial of the purposes of setting up legislative committees. It was a denial of the purpose for which the Committee on Rules was set up. It was a denial of the right of the Members to vote upon legislation.

Many, many chairmen of committees in order to get legislation which their committees had approved unanimously felt compelled to strike out or change provisions in order to satisfy the whim of two or three Members of Congress who happened to be on the Committee on Rules.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, we have made some progress in the last 2 years. If we go back to the old rules, we are simply turning over, Mr. Speaker, not to seven members of the Committee on Rules but to a majority of seven members, four members, the power to say what legislation this House shall consider. If seven members of the Committee on Rules sit on the question of granting a rule for a piece of legislation, and four of those members are against it, that legislation will not be reported out. The House will be stymied and its will will be denied, the will of the people will be denied, and the House will not even be allowed to debate that legislation.

I submit that the country will resent any action taken by this House today which seeks to rescind the rule which was adopted 2 years ago and which has been approved by the overwhelming majority of the people of this country. I think it would be a crime to abrogate our right at least to debate legislation which has been approved by legislative committees.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, in my 16 years here I have heard the Committee on Rules condemned for its failure to report rules on some measures reported by legislative committees. On the other hand, I have heard the great Committee on Rules very often commended in the highest terms for what many said was a noble, patriotic, and high-minded action in preventing certain measures from coming to the floor.

I served on the Committee on Rules for a number of years. I served under the chairmanship of the very genial gentleman from Illinois, Judge SABATH. I also served in one Congress as majority leader. I think I am qualified to speak about the position of the Committee on Rules and its responsibility to the House of Representatives, yes, and to the country, and to speak of the great, overall, end good, that has been accomplished by the Committee on Rules through the years and prior to the advent of the so-called 21-day rule.

Let me say further: To try to adjust the rules of the House of Representatives to meet an immediate or a particular situation existing today which may not exist tomorrow is, in my opinion, a mistake. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] rather indicated that such is the reason this move is being made, in view of his statement that all of the President's suggestions should be enacted into law.

Let us get this matter out in the open. Let us quit shadow boxing about it. Let us talk about it as a matter of principle. The reason the proponents of the 21-day rule are so vigorous and so active is that they think they see in the Committee on Rules something of a balance wheel in the way of unwise, unsound, and ill-timed, spendthrift, socialistic measures which, in my opinion and the opinion of many others, should not be enacted into law. Again let me refer to the remarks of my very good friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. He says he is for all of the President's program. I take it that would include socialized medicine, the socialistic Brannan farm program, and all of the other things we have heard about.

The gentleman from Illinois says he occasionally finds himself in the minority on the Committee on Rules. I take it that what he is saying to us quite frankly is that he is afraid if he did get a socialized-medicine bill out of a legislative committee the Committee on Rules would not report it to the floor.

Let me say, for my part, that if such a bill did come out of a legislative committee I would want the Committee on Rules to block it.

Through the years the Committee on Rules has been the strong right arm of responsible leadership. That is the reason the committee is made up of eight members of the majority party and four members of the minority party. It has always been that way. It was that way when there were only 88 Republicans in the House of Representatives.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] says that the only purpose of the Committee on Rules is to regulate the flow of traffic. Once in a while, if responsible leadership decrees otherwise, the regulation could mean stopping the flow of traffic. In my opinion, that is in the best interests of the Nation.

If the Committee on Rules is to grant a rule on every bill which is reported, regardless of what the position of the leadership may be and regardless of what the chances of enactment of such legislation on the floor of the House might be, then I ask, "Why have the Committee on Rules at all?" Except, I might remind you, that every once in a while the gentleman from Pennsylvania and others of the Committee on Ways and Means are not averse to asking the Committee on Rules to give them a gag rule or a closed rule so that measures which they bring to the floor will not be subject to amendment.

It ought to be clear to everyone, there are a great many bills reported out by legislative committees which should not come to the floor of the House for action. Probably I am treading on dangerous ground, but I am going to say this: Legislative committees very frequently tend to draw to their ranks people whose interests are those of the committee, and very often it happens that in the work of the committee through the years the members of the committee tend to become special pleaders for that particular interest. Many times they report legislation which is out of line with what the leadership wants and which is out of line with what the overall majority of the membership of the House wants. What sense does it make to bring measures like that to the floor of the House?

May I say—and this is in the nature of a confession we might as well make and be frank with ourselves—that occasionally legislative committees report measures which they think are good. Meanwhile, responsible leaders, concerned about the state of the Treasury and the impact generally on the economy of the country, decide the measure should not be enacted into law. The majority of the Members deep down in their hearts many times think it should not be enacted into law. But let us just admit now, my colleagues, that every now and then you get a measure like that. And you know as well as I do, if it comes to the floor of the House of Representatives it is going to be passed. Our beloved Speaker told us he hoped not too many domestic issues would be acted on in this Congress. Apparently the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] have their wires crossed because the gentleman from Illinois thinks we should have all these measures on the floor of the House.

As far as the war effort is concerned, and as far as our national defense effort is concerned, the Committee on Rules will not under any circumstances stand in the way of any action needed to be taken. I well recall that in the Eightieth Congress we had the matter of selective service presented to us. I think it is fair to say that a majority of the members of the Committee on Rules, as that committee was then constituted, were not in favor of the enactment of the Selective Service Act.

But when the Republican leadership said to them, "This measure must be brought on for action," the Rules Committee voted out a rule.

As far as I have been able to discover in my 16 years here, by and large the Rules Committee has responded when the leadership very definitely said a measure must come to the floor for action.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] has again expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], and we who have been here are well acquainted with his reasoning and his arguments, because he is sincere in his position, and he is very sincere in a status quo state of mind. My friend is very hesitant to look into the future; to try to travel in the future in the best way possible to meet the problems that the reasonably near future presents to us.

He has made the same stereotyped argument that we have heard in the past. Two years ago, when this rule was overwhelmingly adopted, and then later when they had a coalition, which is functioning now—the country is not deceived, they know what is going on today. The Republican Party is the tail of the kite of certain Democratic Members. From a political angle it is the Republican Party that is on trial, in my opinion, because the Eightieth Congress, which was a very powerful factor in the election of President Truman, made a record, and that record was made by the Republican members of the Rules Committee, with that coalition. But they had a majority then. Six Members in the Eightieth Congress on the Republican side made the record of the Eightieth Congress upon which President Truman made his campaign. They tied up the low-cost housing bill. They would not let it come to the floor of the House. Countless Members on the Republican side tried to get it up for consideration. The Rules Committee, in a dictatorial manner, refused absolutely, despite the pleading of Republican Members, to let the bill come up for consideration, to let the House consider that bill. There were several other important bills that they bottled up in the committee arbitrarily. Six men arrogated to themselves complete authority of this House, to prevent the will of the majority from being expressed.

Only the other day we had the union-shop bill under consideration. It passed the House by an overwhelming majority. An overwhelming majority of the House was in favor of that bill. Only about 52 Members of the House, as I remember it, voted against it a few days ago. Yet that bill was tied up in the Rules Committee for months. They never did grant a rule on it.

I remember last year when they brought up this matter the second time, when they talk about the Rules Committee economizing, that same committee reported out a bonus bill that would have cost the Government billions of dollars, and we had to recommit it by one or two votes. That is the very committee that tries to present the argument that we are going to save money.

Only a few days after, in the last Congress, we defeated the attempt to repeal this rule, the Rules Committee reported out a bill that would have meant billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money if it had been passed. So, the argument of economy falls to the ground. So, what is the real issue? The real issue is whether you and I, elected as Members of this House, in our own right, are going to permit six men to prevent bills which have been reported out of standing committees, bills of a general nature, of interest to the people of the country, from being considered by this House. We are not taking any rights away from the Rules Committee. We give them a reasonable period within which to report a rule. If they do not report a rule, then the chairman of the standing committee can file a resolution under the 21-day discharge rule and if the Committee on Rules does not report a rule out within 21 days, the chairman of the standing committee may call up the bill on 2 days a month. If there are a number of such 21-day discharge resolutions outstanding, the question of recognition rests with the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

This rule was brought about to unshackle the House from the dictatorial control of six members of the Committee on Rules.

The first vote will come on ordering the previous question. If the previous question is ordered, that is the end; if the previous question is voted down, a motion will be offered to strike from the rules the 21-day discharge provision. That will be considered and then there will be a straight vote on the amendment. I hope the previous question will be adopted. If so, that will close all debate for the day on that and settle the question. On the other hand, if it is not adopted I hope that the substitute to be proposed will be defeated, because if adopted it will bring back the dictatorial control of this great body by six members of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER].

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, when the change of rules was adopted it was supposed to take the shackles of the dictatorial power of the Rules Committee off of the membership. The change was adopted under peculiar circumstances. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] moved that the rules of the House of the previous session be adopted with an amendment; that amendment was not in type; it was not printed; nobody had a chance to read it. Then the gentleman from Illinois moved the previous question so there could be no debate on the subject. Today, at least, we have a chance to talk about the issue that is involved. The only phase I want to talk about is this question of the House having no appeal from the dictatorial action of the Committee on Rules.

It so happens that I have been a member of the Committee on Rules for the past 4 years. It is very probable that I shall not be a member of that committee in this session; hence, I am not talking to you wanting any personal power.

We have had in the rules of the House for many, many years a provision known as Calendar Wednesday, under which on every second Wednesday during the entire session, unless two-thirds of the membership signify their willingness to waive the rule, the chairmen of committees may bring up legislation which has been voted out of their committees and which is on either the Union or the Consent Calendar, without any reference whatever to the Rules Committee. That particular proviso has been in the rules since time immemorial and has been used here on occasion.

I am amazed when I hear the majority leader and the gentleman who has been chairman of the Committee on Rules for so many years say that the Committee on Rules is in a position to block anything it sees fit to block. I have heard the majority leader here day after day after day move to suspend the rules with regard to Calendar Wednesday. He knows as well as I do that last year one of the most controversial measures brought before the House came before the House under operation of the Calendar Wednesday rule and not because of the 21-day rule.

Why not return to what was an orderly method of procedure?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The Rules Committee was set up by a group of the broadest-minded men who ever served in the Congress, for the very purpose the gentleman is talking about. I want to call attention to one thing the gentleman has left out. We can petition a bill out by the signatures of half the membership. It takes half the membership to do that.

Mr. HERTER. The gentleman is correct. The majority of the House at any time can express its will. In other words, the House can override what has been referred to as the dictatorial powers of the Rules Committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to add one other thing. In any orderly procedure you have got to have some clearing body whether you call it a policy committee or a rules committee in the operations of the House. The majority party has been given double the number of members of the minority party in exercising its function in the Rules Committee. Years ago the power was taken away from the Speaker of the House to appoint committee members in the House when that power was abused and there has been in the past an altering of the rules because of the actions of single individuals. This change in the rules came about because certain Members, particularly on the majority side, on account of the seniority rule which was adopted many years ago, were distrustful of their own membership in steering their own party policy. That is a situation, Mr. Speaker, that should not be remedied by a change of rules. That is a situation that ought to be changed by the majority party in selecting its own members of the Rules Committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, I regret that an attempt was made on the part of the majority to make it appear that they alone were opposed to this change in the rules. There are a number of Members on this side of the aisle who are opposed to eliminating the 21-day rule and who have been all along. I am one of them.

It seems to me very clear that the rules as they now stand are better than they would be if the proposed change were made for the reason that now the majority leadership has, as it should have, the responsibility for determining what the legislative program will be. That responsibility is much clearer than it would be if the rules were changed back.

I do not say that the 21-day rule is perfect or that it always works. It is not perfect. But under it the responsibility of the majority is clearer than it would otherwise be. As a matter of fact, it has not always worked. In the case of the FEPC bill it did not work. But in the case of the FEPC bill we were able under the rule to determine squarely where the responsibility lay. It was impossible in that instance for the majority leadership to avoid the responsibility.

It should never be possible for the House to escape or avoid declaring its position on any important issue. And if protection is necessary against hasty action or the pressure of selfish groups, the responsibility for it should not be in a two-headed bipartisan operation as it is under the Rules Committee. It ought to be in the majority leadership. That responsibility should be clear, and the power should go with it.

I am confident that many of my colleagues on this side of the aisle will adhere to the position they have taken in the past and continue to support the 21-day rule.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I have taken this time to identify myself with those on my side of the aisle who feel that the rule for bringing up bills under the 21-day rule should be retained in its present form.

I would like to say that I do not think this is either a Republican or a Democrat question. It is an American question. I have a deep and abiding belief in the principle that the private economy of the United States is the fundamental basis of our free institutions and I belong where I am on the Republican side of the aisle for that reason. But that tradition is exactly what compels me to oppose this proposed rules' change.

We are trying to influence the whole world on the side of freedom. The question before us in this 21-day rule is one of whether the people shall have more direct expression in the House than they had before when bills had to go through the Rules Committee. On that issue I think if we want to make the example to the world of the democratic process that we are preaching we must stand for the proposition that the people shall have the most direct access possible, which means keeping this 21-day rule exactly as it is.

The proof of the validity of this position is in the fact that despite Calendar Wednesday and the discharge petition, bills did get bottled up in the Rules Committee before the 21-day rule was put into effect—desirable bills that the country wanted. An outstanding example of how the 21-day rule can work in the very interests of the freedoms we are fighting for was the bringing up of the statehood bills for Hawaii and Alaska under the 21-day rule.

To repeal the 21-day rule is a step backward—this is not a time to move backward. I hope the House will vote down any change in this rule.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in this Republic of ours it is very important that we proceed under an established system of laws. The respect that the House of Representatives will have throughout the country and the good that it will do will depend upon the system of procedure we have here and the fixing of definite responsibilities. I believe that the power of the Committee on Rules as it was exercised up until the recent change ought to be continued. I think we ought to have a right to vote for the rules as they existed prior to the change of 2 years ago. The test of liberalism in this body will be the vote on the previous question. Unless the previous question is voted down, the opponents of this particular rule will not get a chance to offer a substitute. So, let it be said if anyone here is contending for a liberal position, that gives all the parties a right to present their plans, they must vote down the previous question so that the alternative question can be submitted to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I take this position because I believe it is good for the country. I take this position because I am convinced that it will prevent the advancement for consideration and the passage of much legislation that will be very costly, legislation that we can do without. It will prevent the passage of much legislation that will enlarge this Government; that will put more burdens upon our citizens. It will retard the passage of legislation that will create more rules and regulations and restrictions for our citizens. I wonder how many Members in the campaign of last year promised their people that they were going to come down here and vote for a system to speed up the passage of legislation for the enlargement of our Government, of legislation that will cost more, of legislation that will establish more boards, bureaus, and agencies. Our survival depends upon the solvency of our country. This Congress must not miss a single chance to eliminate or reduce expenditures. These huge expenditures are causing the cost of living to soar and are destroying all values.

Now, a word to those new Members here. Under the rule that operated so successfully for many years, after a legislative committee reported out a bill, with the exception of certain privileged measures, it is sent to the Committee on Rules. It is a chance for a second look; a second consideration. What is wrong with that? The gentleman from Pennsylvania objected because the Committee on Rules studied the legislation and looked into its merits. Why should not legislation be studied at all stages?

My most impelling reason for taking the position I do is that I believe it will save the taxpayers of the country millions and millions of dollars. Thoughtful citizens over the country are very much concerned for the solvency of our Government. They are alert to the huge expenditures being made by this Congress.

Perhaps not enough attention is given to authorization measures. It is the authorization measures that set up new boards and bureaus and that call for new Government activities and services. These bills come from the legislative committees. We will grant that the legislative committees give thorough consideration to these proposals. They are usually unaware, however, of the proposals that are being advanced by other legislative committees. It is necessary and important that there be one committee that reviews all of these proposals. This way the sum total of the cost of these many proposals can be appraised. To have the Rules Committee exercise its traditional power retards the enactment of laws, it slows up the process of enlarging our Government.

If any proposal advanced by a legislative committee is extremely meritorious, if it is necessary and in the interest of our entire country, the Rules Committee will recognize that fact and permit the measure to come to the floor for consideration. The notion that the Rules Committee can thwart the will of the majority is without foundation of fact. A petition signed by a bare majority of 218 Members can take a bill away from the Rules Committee, or any other committee and bring it to the floor for consideration. In addition to the petition method, we have Calendar Wednesday whereby all the committees will have an opportunity to present legislation not otherwise reached in the legislative program. A vote against the Sabath proposal and in favor of the Cox proposal is not a vote to give absolute and dictatorial powers to the Rules Committee. It is a vote for orderly procedure, thorough study, and for an appraisal of the total cost of the proposed acts of the House. In providing these safeguards it will not only mean less Government, but better Government, and it will retard the great increase in the cost of our Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, these are critical times when totalitarian arms and ideas threaten democracy.

Democratic rights and ideas, however, can only be protected through full use thereof. Otherwise we surrender to totalitarian technique.

Formidable tasks ahead will challenge all the wisdom of all of us, not only a part of us.

All intelligence cannot reside in the members of the Rules Committee.

I urge no arbitrary limitation on our ability as Congressmen to decide democratically the momentous issues before us.

Abrogation of the 21-day rule means dangerous restraint upon our effectiveness.

Abrogation means road block to progress.

Abrogation means retreat from democratic process.

Some Rules Committee members have set their judgment athwart many worthy bills. Take, that is, H. R. 2734, the so-called Celler antimonopoly bill. The Rules Committee disregarded my request for a rule, held up the request for months, and finally drove me to ask the Speaker to suspend the rules and pass the bill. The Speaker granted my request. The bill passed overwhelmingly. The Senate accepted it and it is now law. If the Rules members had had their way, the monopolists would have had a field day. See the trouble the Rules Committee put me to, to get the bill passed.

During the Eighty-first Congress eight measures were brought up through resort to the 21-day rule. All passed the House. Furthermore availability of the rule forces the Rules Committee to clear any number of good bills.

Of course orderly procedure requires some supervision of House agenda, but it is absurd to allow ironclad, uninhibited control to a few.

I say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] we need no wet nurse. We are able to take care of ourselves in the rank and file of Members. We need no protection. If what the gentleman said were sound, then let us all abdicate and let the Rules Committee rule completely as dictators.

I shall not surrender to any oligopoly to determine what shall or shall not come before the House.

Remember in an oligopoly "power is the only measure of right."

Congress, like any Nation, could not flourish if it does not march on. The proponents of abrogation of rule 21 would have us remain static—would have us maintain the status quo. To stand still is to move backward.

"Rules Committee-ism" is a canker in our body politic, if the 21-day rule is consigned to limbo. It means an all-powerful Rules Committee. We might as well, then, abdicate.

I warn, a canker has the habit of spreading. It would not end with the negation of the 21-day rule. Power begets power.

The Rules Committee would again become a giant of power. Shakespeare said in Measure for Measure, "It is excellent to have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant."

"Rules Committee-ism" will be as bad as "Thaddeus Stevens-ism." Stevens caused great wrong.

"Rules Committee-ism" is as bad as "Cannon-ism." Cannon caused great evil.

If the rule goes out the window then the Rules Committee would become virtual dictators. "Dictatorship is like a great beach tree—nice to look at but nothing grows under it."

Do not shirk responsibility, gentlemen.

Do not transfer your rights to a select coterie of Members. Amendments have been offered by members of the committee, what right has the Rules Committee to gainsay us and put up a road-block and say "No; the House shall have no opportunity to pass upon these bills"? If that is so, let all of us abdicate. Let us all resign here and now and say that the Rules Committee shall run the affairs of the House.

If the Rules Committee could have their way and this rule were abrogated they would be for the maintenance of the status quo. I say that to remain still is to go backwards. I do not want the country to go backward.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. I am chairman of a legislative committee, just as is the gentleman from New York. I do not appreciate the gentleman's criticism of the Committee on Rules. I believe in the Committee on Rules and I am in favor of changing the rules.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I hope, within the time allotted to me, I may in my humble way contribute something toward clarifying this issue and making it better understood. May I begin by saying you have seen here today only that which you could expect. You have heard those who have been the handmaidens of a certain political philosophy attempting to retain as a part of the rules of the House the particular section pertaining to the 21-day procedure which has been mentioned here. You have heard others of us, who believe in a more realistic political philosophy, oppose that rule. It is only natural that the majority leader, who is very sincere in his position, should challenge and question the position of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] occupies an official party position. As majority leader of the House he is charged with the duty, and has always been very zealous in his efforts to put through every piece of legislation sponsored by the Truman administration, which he has served so ably and so well.

The first vote which will be taken will be on ordering the previous question, for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] will undoubtedly move the previous question. If a majority of the House votes in favor of ordering the previous question, then the only remaining question which can be voted upon will be the resolution itself.

However, if the previous question is voted down—in other words, if the majority of the House votes "no" on ordering the previous question—then it will be in order to introduce the amendment which will strike out the 21-day rule, which was adopted by the last Congress under a very peculiar parliamentary operation which shut off all debate. If the previous question is voted down, we can then fully discuss this amendment on its merits and decide what the rules should be. We can then decide whether we wish to keep the 21-day rule, which was adopted in the last session, or whether we should go back to the old rules which prevailed for 40 years.

I say there is nothing liberal about shutting off debate. There is nothing liberal in saying to the House, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who professes to be a great liberal, proposes, that the House should not be permitted to consider an amendment to his resolution. There is nothing liberal about that. He says he is a great liberal. But he wants to shut off debate and to keep this body from discussing or voting on any amendment, or deciding whether or not the 21-day rule should be continued.

Let us stop and see what has happened in the past. How did the Committee on Rules receive the power which has been discussed here? It came about as the result of one of the most gallant legislative fights ever made by any Member of the House of Representatives—by George W. Norris, of Nebraska. That happened back in 1910. George W. Norris is known in history as the great liberal. In fact, a book has been written about him as a great liberal. It was the great liberal movement he led that established the power of the Committee on Rules. Prior to that time the Speaker of the House of Representatives appointed all legislative committees, including the Committee on Rules. He was also chairman of the Committee on Rules, so that unless the Speaker himself wanted a piece of legislation to come before the House, the House did not even have a chance to vote on it one way or the other.

So it was Norris, the great liberal, the great liberal of all time, who established this rule which the present-day so-called liberals in the House here today are objecting to, who took away from one man, the Speaker of the House, the power to autocratically control the flow of legislation to the floor, and placed that power in the hands of a committee of 12 members.

Some other things were also done at that time. In order that the Committee on Rules should not become arbitrary, a provision was put in the rules so that a majority of the House could always work its will. Under this provision whenever 218 Members of the House decide they wanted to bring a bill to the floor, they could do so by signing a request or a petition at the Clerk's desk that the bill should be brought up.

So remember, my friends, if this rule is amended, if we do go back to the old rule as we should, the Rules Committee cannot block the consideration of any bill on the floor of the House that a majority of this House wants to consider.

In addition to that, there was and is a provision in the rules establishing Calendar Wednesday twice a month, on which day the roll of the legislative committees are called and, if a majority of any committee, wants to bring up any bill, it can do so when that committee is called. So there are two ways that the House can always work its will.

Now what is the proposal of these present-day so-called liberals who boast of their liberalism? They are objecting to adopting a rule that may in any way prevent them from continuing their great liberality with the people's liberties and the people's finances. Instead of permitting the House to function under a duly established Rules Committee, elected by the House itself, they want to place the entire power to decide what bills shall be called up for consideration under certain circumstances in the hands and will of one man—the Speaker of the House. Is this a liberal action? I insist not. Instead, it is the most reactionary proposal which has been before the House in many years—one that would do away with the progressive action of the truly great liberal, George W. Norris, back in 1910.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, this is not just a question which fits any definition as to liberal and conservative. This issue is beyond party lines as it cuts across each party as well.

The question is, Do you Representatives each individually want to take the responsibility in public and be recorded for your votes on vital issues that come before this Congress? If that is the case, you will want no road block or so-called graveyard Rules Committee to kill bills before you get a chance to vote on them on the open floor of this House. Your own people want you to stand up here and be counted. Your constituents are entitled to know how you stand on the major issues.

As you know, the Rules Committee operates by secret vote. There is never a record vote that comes out in public from that committee. The legislation is blocked in secret. No one can tell who blocked any measure and there is no responsibility on any identifiable person. The members of the Rules Committee are generally from so-called safe districts that are carried regularly by large margins, so there is no danger of defeat and public opinion is successfully isolated and ignored. The will of the majority cannot be expressed and can be successfully overruled by a majority of seven Representatives. As this majority is across party lines, there is no party responsibility and the carrying out of the party platform pledges becomes meaningless.

On May 20, 1948, I asked this question: "Why was the naval civil-functions bill, H. R. 6341, with 80 items of defense, including the guided-missiles testing range at Mugu, Calif., held up for a year by the Rules Committee without action when it had been unanimously reported out by the Armed Services Committee over a year previously?" Not one of the Rules Committee answered. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee said, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 5, page 6226, that committee had made application for a rule but the action of the Rules Committee had precluded action on the floor, as follows: "The gentleman—myself—is substantially correct in the remarks he made about the date of reporting the bill and what is in it. We made application to the Committee on Rules a while ago for a rule, but the action of the Committee on Rules has precluded action upon the bill until the present time."

In addition to that, there was much pressure to revive the selective-service law in 1948. The Rules Committee held back consideration of that most important issue. The Armed Services Committee had held hearings, reported the bill by the great margin of 28 to 5, and the Rules Committee arbitrarily refused to act and would not fix a time for debate in the House for weeks. The Rules Committee then held hearings of its own on the legislative questions which were the province of the Armed Services Committee. Great public indignation and National Defense Department warnings of peril to the national safety finally broke the filibuster. Why should such a small group of men have the negative power to even shut off debate on the floor of Congress on such a critical issue?

On H. R. 5965 of the Eighty-first Congress, the 16,000-hospital-bed reinstatement program for servicemen and veterans, action was held up for months by this Rules Committee last year. The bill was reported by the House Veterans' Affairs Committee on August 24, 1949. I went up to the Rules Committee just now to check up. Do you know what is on the Rules Committee records right now as to the hospital-bed reinstatement program—16,000 additional beds for the boys from Korea and the veterans? It says on the records, "Pending—no rule granted." As far as the Rules Committee is concerned, it is still "pending and no action."

If you are interested in national defense and veterans' legislation, if you are interested in getting moderate social legislation even debated publicly in this House without being knifed in secret vote by unknown hands, if you are interested in party responsibilty, so that the people who have party responsibility take that responsibility in public vote, then you do not want across the hall a secret majority in the Rules Committee that does to the death everything they, and they alone, believe in their superior wisdom, might get out of hand on the floor. I have confidence in you, in your good intentions. I hope and believe you will each take your own responsibility and vote to meet the issues in public and on record on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON] has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, democratic processes of legislative bodies throughout the world are on trial today before the various peoples of the world. So it is today in the United States. The democratic process of allowing a majority of the Congress of the United States to consider a piece of legislation which has been considered vital by the chairman of one of the 19 standing committees and a majority of that committee, which has been considered vital for the best interests of the people, the right to bring that legislation to the floor and let each and every Member of this body rise and take his own responsibility here for that measure is on trial today. Do you know what happened in the Eighty-first Congress?

Eight measures were brought to the floor of the House and passed by great majorities because of the 21-day rule. What were they? The anti-poll-tax bill. How did the majority on the Democratic side vote on that? And how did the majority vote on the Republican side? But you could not get it to the floor from the Rules Committee because seven men said you could not consider it and pass it.

The rivers and harbors flood-control bill was brought to the floor by the Congressman from Mississippi, Mr. Whittington, was considered and passed by a great majority. The Alaska statehood bill and the Hawaii statehood bill were brought to the floor under the 21-day rule and passed by great majorities. The National Science Foundation Act, which had to do with the national defense, was passed under the 21-day rule. The National Minerals Act to subsidize vital minerals was passed on this floor because of the 21-day rule. And the Veterans' Administration hospital bill was brought to this floor by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] under the 21-day rule and passed by a majority of this House. That is part of the legislation passed because of the 21-day rule.

A bill contributing funds to United Nations agencies was also passed.

In addition to the legislation actually passed under the 21-day rule, other important legislation was reluctantly given rules by the Rules Committee. Among these were the bills to broaden and improve social security coverage and benefits, the bill to increase the national minimum wage rate from 40 cents per hour to 75 cents per hour, and the housing bill from the Banking and Currency Committee.

The 21-day rule has proven its worth. I, therefore, request that the Members preserve it by voting aye on the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. In order to offer an amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois the previous question will have to be voted down.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered there will be no amendment, of course.

The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 247, not voting 2, not sworn in 5, as follows:

So the previous question was not ordered.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the resolution, which I send to the Speaker's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. Cox: Strike out all after the Resolved and insert "That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-first Congress, together with all applicable provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, be, and they are hereby, adopted as the rules of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-second Congress, with the following amendment included therein as a part thereof, to wit:

"Paragraph (2) (c) of rule XI is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(c) The Committee on Rules shall present to the House reports concerning rules, joint rules, and order of business, within three legislative days of the time when ordered reported by the committee. If such rule or order is not considered immediately, it shall be referred to the calendar and, if not called up by the Member making the report within seven legislative days thereafter, any member of the Rules Committee may call it up as a question of privilege and the Speaker shall recognize any member of the Rules Committee seeking recognition for that purpose. If the Committee on Rules shall make an adverse report on any resolution pending before the committee, providing for an order of business for the consideration by the House of any public bill or joint resolution, on days when it shall be in order to call up motions to discharge committees it shall be in order for any Member of the House to call up for consideration by the House any such adverse report, and it shall be in order to move the adoption by the House of said resolution adversely reported notwithstanding the adverse report of the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker shall recognize the Member seeking recognition for that purpose as a question of the highest privilege.'"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the gentleman please state whether or not the amendment as he submitted it is in the exact language as it appeared in the rules before the change was made?

Mr. COX. Exactly so, sir.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman means with the exception of the additions that he added? As amended it is not the exact rule that we had during the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. COX. It is the same rule we had in the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. With your amendments in there?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And for years previous.

Mr. COX. And for years previous.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. Would the gentleman advise what he might be disposed to do on time for those opposed to the rule?

Mr. COX. I have made no decision.

Mr. Speaker, when I went on the Rules Committee many years ago I was told that it was a difficult place to fill and was admonished that it would not be permissible at any time that I should consult my own personal political welfare, but that I should ever make decision on questions coming before the committee upon the basis of what I conceived to be for the best interests of the country. Mr. Speaker, I have sought to keep that charge. If I know my heart and mind, I speak the truth when I say that there has never been a time when I submerged what I conceived to be the good of my country to party regularity. And, Mr. Speaker, I should like it to be remembered that I am a member of the Rules Committee because of the interest taken by the occupant of the chair, and I wish here to bear testimony to the fact that at no time have I ever been free of deep solicitude for his peace of mind, his happiness, and his official success. At no time in all my life have I given a deeper and a more consistent affection to any man other than members of my immediate family than I have to this distinguished citizen of whom I speak.

Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that when we assembled here 2 years ago, fresh as we were from a great victory, there was demand for the scalps of people who had stood in the way of reform measures advocated by many prominent figures in this House and the country. The Rules Committee had incurred the displeasure of many because it had, in keeping with what it believed to be the good of the country, refused to stampede under the lash of the whip applied by strong unofficial minority groups.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Rules Committee has not been unmindful of the wishes of the leadership; they were not so during the Speakership of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]; and at no time have they been so under the Speakership of the gentleman from Texas, or the leadership of my long-time and devoted friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

I know, Mr. Speaker, the idea prevails that the Committee on Rules has fought with the leadership, that it has been unbending to the wishes of the leadership; but I want to make a revelation, one that will be a surprise to the country: There has never been a time during my membership on the Committee on Rules that the Speaker of this House made a request that action be taken that I did not respond affirmatively to it. I should say, however, that the Speaker would never make a request that involved the sacrifice of principle. The present Speaker and his predecessor never on a single occasion sought to high-pressure the Rules Committee, and as much can be said of the majority and minority leaders.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we propose to go back to the old rule, the rule that was adopted in 1924, I believe, and liberalized in 1931 under a fight conducted by the gentleman from Georgia, the lamented Charles Crisp. I submit that what is proposed is in the interest of orderly procedure and that it is a step which this House, in my judgment, should take.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER].

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield for that purpose?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HERTER: Add to the end of the amendment offered by Mr. Cox the following:

"Amend clause 7 of rule 24 by adding thereto the following: 'Provided further, That, pending action on the previous question, no motion for adjournment or other motion which in the opinion of the Chair is frivolous or has for its purpose delaying consideration of a motion on the previous question shall be entertained by the Chair'."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 1 hour, but the Chair hopes he will explain his amendment.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is not an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman has offered it as such and, therefore, it being before the House he may debate it for 1 hour if he wishes. The Chair would like for the gentleman from Massachusetts to take time to explain what he means by this amendment because the Chair does not understand it.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate if the point of order might be delayed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. HERTER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under the parliamentary situation as now exists, the previous question having been voted down on the original resolution, could the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] be offered as a separate amendment rather than as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has offered it as an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, a further inquiry as to the parliamentary situation. If the gentleman from Massachusetts should withdraw the offering of his amendment as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] might he subsequently offer it as a separate amendment?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean after disposition of the other matter?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes; after acting upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

The SPEAKER. A substitute cannot be amended after it is agreed to.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair should sustain the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, then, of course, that would dispose of the question without the hour's debate, would it not?

The SPEAKER. It would, but the Chair wants to know what this is all about and trusts that the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he is going to insist on his amendment, will explain it. The Chair does not understand it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I am still reserving my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled on the point of order.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, at this time is a substitute amendment in order to either the amendment now pending offered by the gentleman from Georgia or to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER]?

The SPEAKER. A substitute would not be in order to a substitute.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, a unanimous consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact I am advised that the Rules Committee is willing to consider this matter at an early date as a separate proposition, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw it as a matter of right.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 243, nays 180, not voting 5, not sworn in 5, as follows:

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, your committee appointed on the part of the House to join a like committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled and is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make has performed that duty. The President asked us to report that he will be pleased to deliver his message at 1 o'clock p. m., January 8, 1951, at a joint session of the two Houses.

JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS ON JANUARY 8, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 8th day of January 1951, at 1 o'clock p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make.

The House concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the House of Representatives shall be at 12 o'clock meridian.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 11) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations and the subcommittees thereof be authorized to sit during sessions and recesses of the Eighty-second Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, when the House adjourns tomorrow it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

RECESS ON MONDAY NEXT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker may declare a recess at any time on January 8, 1951, subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

INTRODUCTION AND REFERENCE OF BILLS TODAY

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to make a statement concerning the introduction and reference of bills today.

As Members are aware, they have the privilege today of introducing bills. Heretofore on the opening day of a new Congress several thousand bills have been introduced. It will be readily apparent to all Members that it may be a physical impossibility for the Speaker to examine each bill for reference today. The Chair will do his best to refer as many bills as possible, but he will ask the indulgence of Members if he is unable to refer all of them that may be introduced. Those bills which are not referred and do not appear in the daily RECORD as of today will be included in the next day's RECORD and printed with a date as of today. The Chair feels that he should make this statement at this time so Members may be aware of the difficulties that immediately present themselves.

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of title 40, sections 175 and 176, United States Code, the Chair appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. AUCHINCLOSS] members of the House Office Building Commission to serve with himself.

OUTBREAK OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN MEXICO

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I want to take just a minute to report to the House the facts concerning the new outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico which was mentioned briefly in this morning's papers. As the Members are aware, foot-and-mouth disease was first discovered in Mexico a little more than 4 years ago. Since that time the United States has spent more than $120,000,000 in an effort to fight and eradicate that disease in Mexico to prevent it spreading across the border into the cattle ranches, dairy farms, and hog farms of this country.

Thus far that effort appears to have been successful. The disease has been prevented from spreading northward into northern Mexico and the United States. A campaign of slaughter and burial of diseased and exposed animals, plus vaccination of all susceptible animals in the infected area, has stopped the disease in its tracks and this outbreak which has just been reported is the first active case of the disease that has been found in Mexico since December 26, 1949—just a little more than a year ago.

Since the first outbreak of the disease in Mexico, the Livestock Subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture has kept a close watch on the situation. It has reported to the House from time to time and has taken the lead in initiating whatever legislative action was necessary and in establishing congressional policy toward the campaign. That subcommittee has been headed by three very able chairmen: Dr. George Gillie in the Eightieth Congress, and Representatives Eugene Worley, of Texas, and Walter K. Granger, of Utah, in the Eighty-first Congress. With the assignment of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. GRANGER] to the Ways and Means Committee, I have been designated as chairman of that subcommittee in the Eighty-second Congress.

As the new chairman of the subcommittee I met with officials of the Department of Agriculture yesterday to discuss with them this latest news from Mexico. As the result of that conference I want to assure Members of the House that this new outbreak of the disease—while it is discouraging—is not alarming and does not mean any change in the eradication campaign in Mexico.

The outbreak occurred in the State of Veracruz, Mexico. That is one of the States on the Gulf of Mexico. The municipality of Espinal, where the disease was found, is about 50 miles from the Gulf and about 100 miles south of the northern quarantine line. This means it is about 300 miles south of the border.

The disease was found in a herd of 56 cattle on a small ranch where they were being pastured for slaughter. The first sick animals were discovered by the rancher last Wednesday. By last Friday more of the animals were sick and the situation was reported to the authorities. Field and laboratory diagnosis was made immediately by veterinary technicians, and on Sunday the entire herd was appraised, slaughtered, and buried.

There are now 16 veterinary inspection teams combing the area of the outbreak for any further signs of the disease and none have been discovered as yet. We hope, of course, that they will not be able to find any. But we will not be too much discouraged if they do, and we will deal with any active disease promptly.

Never before in history has there been an effort to eradicate foot-and-mouth disease on the scale which has been undertaken jointly by the Governments of Mexico and the United States in Mexico. There were many who predicted that it could not be done—that the disease would continue forever in Mexico and we here in the United States would have to live forever in the constant dread of it spreading across the border.

No one was willing to predict that the fight would be as successful as it has been thus far. I personally consider it amazing that we have had only this one active outbreak of the disease in the past 12 months. Our hope, of course, is that this is merely a localized flare-up and that the virus of the disease is actually dying out in most of the infected area.

Only time and constant effort and vigilance can determine the outcome, but in this period when all the food production resources of this country are being called upon again for their greatest output, we must conquer this disease in Mexico and prevent the disaster that would result from its entry into this country.

I want to assure the House that the livestock subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture will seek to continue, as it has in the past, to work closely and constantly with the officials of our Department of Agriculture and State Department with representatives of the livestock industry and with Mexican officials in the campaign against this disease. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. COOLEY], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has today introduced a resolution to authorize and provide for the continuation of the work of the Livestock Subcommittee. If so authorized we will keep a constant watch on the situation and will report promptly to you any developments of consequence.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS

Mr. McKINNON. Mr. Speaker, I was detained and was not here to respond on the last roll call. Had I been here, I would have voted "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present during the last roll call. I should like to have the RECORD show that had I been present I would have voted "nay."

HON. EVERETT McKINLEY DIRKSEN

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, the city of Pekin and the county of Tazewell, Ill., have been signally honored today by the inauguration of EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN as junior Senator from the State of Illinois.

I heard Mr. DIRKSEN make a speech last night on a program called the Capitol Cloakroom. He said that he was not ashamed to admit that he was a reexaminationist, that he believed we should examine our foreign policy, and that we should reexamine some of the gifts that have gone to foreign lands for which we have had no expression of appreciation whatsoever, and for which no fighting men have been sent from these foreign countries.

I believe that his colleagues in the Senate as well as his old friends here in the House will go along with Senator DIRKSEN in a further policy of reexamination of this foreign policy and our spending of funds in foreign lands.

EIGHT TIPS TO FOLLOW IN 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, revise and extend my remarks and include an article from the Boston Globe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, General MacArthur cabled me on December 26: "No matter against what odds, we will do the best we can." Today I believe every loyal American in the United States thinks every minute of the day about our men fighting and dying for us in Korea.

Every one of us is thanking them and praying for them. Every one is supremely grateful to them for their sacrifices. I know these men in Korea want us to keep sane and well in this terrible time in the history of America. Hence I am giving eight tips for a jittery America. They were suggested by State Health Commissioner Vlado A. Getting. The eighth tip which he gives is: "Strengthen your own personal weapon of faith." I would put that first and I would spell Faith with a capital "F."

The article is as follows:

[From the Boston (Mass.) Globe of January 2, 1951]

EIGHT TIPS TO FOLLOW IN JITTERY 1951

Laughter and relaxation, good food and exercise are more important than ever in these times of war jitters, State Health Commissioner Vlado A. Getting pointed out in a New Year message today.

The commissioner issued eight tips for remaining healthy and happy despite the current tensions. The tips:

1. Keep in top shape physically. Eat plenty of varied and nourishing food. Sleep 8 hours each night and avoid overfatigue.

2. Invest wisely in a regular check-up by your family doctor and dentist.

3. Look for laughter and relaxation. Take time out now and then for a good joke, the movies, theater, your favorite sport, or radio humorist.

4. Keep busy. Find more things to do. Develop new interests and hobbies.

5. If your physical condition permits, try brisk exercise outdoors, if possible, every day. Play golf, tennis, baseball, or other active sports. Leave your worrying habits behind.

6. Don't let the war jitters get you down. Curb your imagination. Find out how to protect yourself and your family against enemy attack. Join civil-defense activities. Decide what you can best contribute to your community and do it.

7. Do things promptly. Don't shirk responsibility. Putting off decisions, problems, and jobs only makes them more difficult.

8. Strengthen your own personal weapon of faith.

FLAGG SPRINGS CITIZEN OF FANNIN COUNTY, TEX., PAYS WONDERFUL TRIBUTE TO SPEAKER SAM RAYBURN

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a letter and also a poem in tribute to the Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have just received from H. E. Perry, of Honey Grove, Tex., route 1, a letter, the excerpts from which are as follows:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PATMAN: I take this opportunity to write you as I am a 49-year-old tenant farmer in Fannin County, Tex., living in the Flagg Springs community where my beloved friend, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, House Speaker, and his most gracious father and mother lived for 27 years before he moved to Bonham where he now resides. This little quiet farm community has been given national recognition by reason of our beloved Speaker living here, and as a young man got his first schooling at Flagg Springs.

I have composed and written some poems of tribute to this great statesman. I gave him a copy through my local Honey Grove Signal newspaper and I don't have a typewriter or a printed copy, so I will write it in longhand by pencil for you. Also you are such a close friend to the Speaker, I am sure you, along with other friends, will honor Mr. RAYBURN on January 6, 1951, at his birthday dinner. I wish you would read this on this occasion and also if possible put it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I surely will thank you so kindly as an humble farm tenant with only a ninth-grade education in my feeble but sincere effort tried to pay my heart's honest tribute to this great American. Oh, for his eloquence to pay him his just desert. * * *

Sincerely yours,

H. E. PERRY.

HONEY GROVE, TEX.

A TRIBUTE

We love our dear SAM RAYBURN,
  Speaker of the Nation's House.
He is a refined, cultured gentleman,
  He is a son of the native South.

He is a Texan by choice and adoption,
  But Tennessee is the State of his birth.
As a fighter for freedom and justice,
  There is no equal of him on earth.

In 1912 he was elected to Congress
  On March 4, 1913, he took his seat
He has made such a faithful servant
  In no campaign was he ever beat.

His tribute to womanhood,
  Was a life of devotion to his mother,
His tribute to mankind
  Was a living tribute faithful as a brother.

It was in the Flagg Springs community
  As a youth he grew brave and strong,
His love for truth and justice
  Made a man who will do no wrong.

In spite of fame and honor
  He never lost the common touch.
His devotion to the Democratic ideals
  Inspires us all so much.

We Americans live with confidence
  When his hand guides the ship of state.
He is so sincere and consistent,
  His true heart never harbors hate.

Mr. RAYBURN is a great fighter
  For freedom, for peace and right,
We pray as we support him
  For the world he wins this fight.

His noble father and sainted mother
  Gave him an untarnished name.
He has written it in imperishable letters
  In his country's Hall of Fame.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RANKIN:

H. R. 1. A bill to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. CROSSER:

H. R. 2. A bill to create an independent Air Safety Board; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. RANKIN:

H. R. 3. A bill to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. ABBITT:

H. R. 4. A bill to amend the peanut-marketing quota provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BYRNE of New York:

H. R. 5. A bill to create a National Cemetery Commission for the consolidation of national cemetery activities within one civilian commission, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. PHILLIPS:

H. R. 6. A bill to provide for research into and demonstration of practical means for the economical production, from sea or other saline waters or from the atmosphere (including cloud formations), of water suitable for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and other beneficial consumptive uses, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. McKINNON:

H. R. 7. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer.

O Thou who art the supreme intelligence and the only source of all wisdom and strength for life's many strange and difficult adventures, make us daily more conscious of Thy greatness and goodness. We rejoice that with this assurance we need not be afraid to enter upon any new day, however freighted it may be with heavy burdens.

Grant that we may have a clear perception and understanding of that which is right and necessary and helpful and worth while.

May we be wise and strong and courageous enough to do faithfully and well whatever any occasion or circumstance or duty may demand.

Inspire and sustain us with the confident conviction that righteousness and truth shall prevail and that Thy divine will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MINORITY WHIP

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce to the House that the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. LESLIE C. ARENDS, has been elected Republican whip.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a resolution (H. Res. 44) and ask for its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MAJORITY WHIP

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce to the House that I have reappointed as the majority whip the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. PRIEST.

THE LATE HONORABLE CLEVELAND DEAR

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce to the House the death of my predecessor in this body, the Honorable Cleveland Dear, of Alexandria, La., who passed away at his home in Alexandria, La., on December 30.

Mr. Dear served as a Member of this body in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses and rendered great service to the Nation. He did not run for reelection but returned home and was elected to the local bench where he served with honor and distinction as the judge of the ninth judicial district, Rapides Parish, La.

I have known Cleveland Dear for nearly 40 years. He and I were schoolmates at the Louisiana State University. He was a good student and when he got out of school, he engaged in the active practice of law. For some years he was district attorney of the ninth judicial district of Louisiana and served ably in that capacity. He has been an able jurist for a good many years.

He leaves a wife and two children. I know his fine wife quite well. She is a wonderful woman. I know that Mr. Dear's family will greatly miss him. I know that he will be missed by a great host of friends and I know also that the bench and bar of his judicial district and the entire State will miss him. To his family and friends I extend my deepest sympathy and pray that God will sustain them in this hour of their great loss.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great sense of sorrow that I weigh the loss to Louisiana and to the Nation of one of its most distinguished sons, former Representative Cleveland Dear of Alexandria, La.

Cleveland Dear was an unselfish and devoted servant of his fellow man in every facet of his career. When the Kaiser's armies marched against democracy, Cleveland Dear left his law practice and served as a courageous young officer of the United States Field Artillery. For 13 years after World War I, he served ably and conscientiously as district attorney of the ninth judicial district of Louisiana.

In the lean years of the 1930's—when the people of our great Nation were crying out for inspired and unselfish leadership—he offered himself to the voters of Louisiana's Eighth Congressional District as a candidate for the Congress. Upon his election to the Congress for two consecutive terms, he dedicated himself to wise and responsible legislation, winning the respect and confidence of those who knew him.

Some 9 years ago, he took his place on the bench of the judicial district which he had served as district attorney. A champion of justice, his tenure as a district judge was marked with fairness, impartiality, and a rare devotion to duty.

Louisiana is filled with sadness as it takes stock of the loss of this faithful and devoted servant.

Although much time has elapsed since he gave up his membership in the House of Representatives, Judge Dear left many admiring friends in the House and throughout the Nation.

Our special sympathy and prayers go to his widow and two children.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. POTTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered.

AN OVERLOADED MIND

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a letter I received from a constituent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from one of my constituents which is as follows:

I do hope you will have backbone enough to read this letter in Congress before you throw it in the waste basket.

It is signed by Mr. Alvin D. Snyder, Paynesville, Minn., and the letter he speaks of is as follows:

AN OVERLOADED MIND

The Honorable FRED MARSHALL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Will you please read this letter when you have a good attendance in Congress?

I am so filled, and there are many others like me, that I want you to know how a lot of us fathers' hearts feel. We ordinary people go to the polls to select the man we feel will be capable of doing his duty.

It is our opinion a bunch of 18-year-olds could do just as good a job. We consider frankly you are not fit to handle people's lives. You, each and everyone of you, are only our hired men. You should honor us for setting you in Washington with a nice suit and white collar.

We are not sending you to Washington to constantly argue. Just because you think you are safe for 2 years, some of you would have a different smile if we voters would use an old-time horse whip. Our Government has now got the young people to the stage where they no longer care.

Now let's change this thing around. Let's draft all the men from 35 to 60. There surely would be a lot of you fellows in that line. Also myself. Why this group's first answer would be, oh, no. What would become of my business and my family. All right. These young people want a business also. Their heart is in just the same place as yours, and when a sweet young man of 21 has to give his life in battle the old saying is, "He died for his country." Like h——; he is dying to save the hide of you hired men.

I am nearly 60 years old. We have raised seven children, four boys and three girls. I have two boys home, running my farm. They are both single, ready to take over, but uncertain as to the Government plans.

I can no longer carry on. I have farmed for 34 years, and seldom had a white collar on except for Sunday.

We have 60 feeder steers, a fine bunch of high-grade Holstein cows and calves, also have 24 sows bred for spring farrowing, and 700 laying hens.

Now, are you, Congressmen, going to ruin this farm economy by taking such boys and let the draft boards tell us fathers. We should worry; we have a large surplus.

Let me tell you on these draft boards you have made sure that you haven't many farmers on them. We are, Your Honor, entitled to one farmer seat on that board, and you Congressmen should make this clear.

We are against you Congressmen raising money from our United States by the millions nearly every week and sending it to another country. We don't think our Congress knows the difference between $1 or a million. I don't think we have a man in Congress that has set himself behind a milk pail and milked cows for 34 years, but it seems very easy for you to raise our taxes and shove a wad of our money under other countries' noses, and all we get back is bullets at our boys. I believe I could run Congress all alone and do a better job than all of you together.

If anyone thinks I am wrong in my opinion, please answer me back.

ALVIN D. SNYDER,
PAYNESVILLE, MINN.

SPEEDING UP AMERICA'S DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, my heart is heavy as I see the apparent lack of speed on the part of those in authority in Washington handling our all-important defense program.

As a Member of this House during preparations for our defense before Pearl Harbor, I recall there was a feverish enthusiasm which spurred everybody in high places to get things moving.

By the time we were called on to fight Hitler and the Japs, Washington was a beehive of activity, with elaborate and gigantic plans to build the greatest Army and Navy the world had ever seen.

Today, although they are drafting men back home with absolutely no regard for family circumstances and calling everybody to the colors with scarcely a deferment, uprooting homes, business and jobs, there is little but apathy here in the Nation's Capital.

We are moving too slowly in building the weapons and equipment which our servicemen must have to defend the country against more terrible foes than we ever had to reckon with.

While Germany and her satellites had powerful armies at their command, they were insignificant compared with the might of the Soviet Union and the Chinese Reds.

There are today ready to march against us at the raising of a Communist finger armed forces 20 times larger than the Nazis could ever muster. Most of these hordes are well equipped, not a few with American arms and material.

Such a dangerous situation, therefore, ought to galvanize the appointed heads of our defense effort into immediate action. In spite of repeated urging by Congress there is still little evidence on the surface that anything is being done which will remotely approach the all-out preparations for our defense of 1941.

For this reason, and also because I am certain the folks back home are far ahead of official Washington in their thinking and their anxiety over our plight, I am introducing the following resolution, and I hope the Secretary of Defense will call his helpers to action as the result of it:

RESOLUTION TO SPEED UP AMERICA'S DEFENSE PROGRAM

Whereas the state of preparedness in the United States is not what it should be; and

Whereas there is evidence that many industries are not receiving defense orders from the Government for which they are waiting; and

Whereas there is a pronounced contrast between the lack of speed in preparing for today's serious exigency and our previous outstanding program of rearming for World War II; and

Whereas the American people are ahead of many Government officials in realizing the gravity of our present situation and how slow is the current rate of defense production: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Defense is hereby requested to make an immediate investigation of—

(1) How many airplanes, tanks, guns, and ships are coming off the assembly line each day;

(2) What is holding up the awarding of defense contracts and subcontracts by the Government to business concerns, large, medium, and small;

(3) Why so many industries, particularly smaller ones, are not yet being utilized in our rearmament program in spite of the fact that our planners have been aware of the danger of delay for over a year; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of Defense is hereby requested to issue an immediate order for full steam ahead in all departments of Government dealing with rearmament problems, said order to speed up our all-out effort in defense production.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING FOR NURSES

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no oojection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is not a Member of this House who is not familiar with the fact that we not only have a shortage of nurses today but that the situation will grow steadily worse with the years ahead.

Today we have but 322,000 trained nurses—the need is for 381,000 nurses. These figures exclude military needs. The military hospitals today have 3,000 nurse vacancies, and if our military forces are increased to the suggested figure we will need an additional 20,000.

The need will be constantly growing as the years pass. The increasing birth rate and longevity of our people alone will call for an ever-increasing group of this trained personnel. We must also consider seriously the tragic aftermath of war, and the urgent need for adequate nursing care for those members of the Armed Forces whose cases are chronic.

Thirty-two years after the termination of World War I, we know that we are providing much-needed nursing care to more than 53,000 veterans of that conflict.

Future wars may very well create an ever larger number of war casualties amongst our Armed Forces—and may even number thousands and thousands of civilians as well.

I have long considered the serious crisis that could occur in the immediate future. I have, therefore, undertaken surveys and consultations with some of our leading private and Government authorities on this important matter. As a result of these many conferences I bring you a comprehensive, long-range program that will improve the health of all segments of our population.

The bill which I am introducing will provide aid for those schools of nursing training which are unable to increase present enrollment because of limited facilities and the high cost of training in the latest modern medical techniques. We also find that there are many worthy and eager applicants for nurse training who cannot pay for that training.

This bill provides for supplemental assistance to nonprofit nursing schools. These funds may be used to cover partially the cost of instruction, expansion of facilities, and the improvement of curricula and equipment. The measure also provides scholarships for student candidates who meet the school-entrance requirements but who are unable to defray the cost of such training. To summarize—this bill should solve the need for additional nurses for the Armed Forces, for our industrial health services, for our civil-defense activities, for our constantly increasing population, and will provide for the rehabilitation of persons who could be restored to the labor force. It will provide a healthier tomorrow for the people of the United States.

There is no substitute for the care that an adequately trained nurse can give. We can and we must plan now for the future in this most important field. We must not leave the health and safety of our people to chance. Ours is the responsibility to act and to act immediately.

Mr. Speaker, I shall see that the membership has copies of the bill, and shall be happy to answer whatever questions come to mind as and when they have opportunity to read it.

PENSIONS FOR CIVIL WAR VETERANS' WIDOWS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter from the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration dated December 26.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that some of my colleagues who were present on December 15, 1950, will recall my speaking of the very sweet old Civil War widow who received about $1,000 in back pension payments that were due her because the Veterans' Administration had not increased her award when she attained the age of 70 years.

I was gratified that the error was found and that payment could be made just before Christmas, for it meant so much to this elderly pensioner. Upon further inquiry, I found that this case was not an exceptional one but it seems to be a routine matter to have such claims for back payment presented.

As I expressed in my previous statement, I felt that the Veterans' Administration should correct this condition and review all Civil War $36 awards to ascertain whether or not the pensioners were receiving all that they were entitled to under existing law.

I telegraphed General Gray, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, suggesting that such a review be made, and I am delighted to present his reply, in which he promises such a review as soon as possible. His letter follows:

DECEMBER 26, 1950.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. ROGERS: This is in reply to your teletype dated December 18, 1950, in which you have referred to those cases in which pension is being paid to Civil War widows who may be entitled to a higher rate by reason of having reached the age of 70 years.

Your interest in this matter is appreciated, and I am directing that a review be instituted immediately of those cases in which pension is being paid to Civil War widows at the rate of $36 monthly. If it is determined in such cases that there may be entitlement to a higher rate under existing laws, action will be taken to authorize the increased pension or to request any additional evidence which may be required. The review will be completed as expeditiously as possible with the personnel available in the Veterans' Administration.

Sincerely yours,

CARL R. GRAY, JR.,
Administrator.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous material, also that my remarks may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

[Mr. BROWN of Ohio addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, the other day I noted in the press that it is the intention of the Department of Agriculture very shortly to permit the entry into this country of meat from Mexico. I think that would be a very foolish thing for the Department to do in view of the fact that just the other day there was a fresh outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease down in the Veracruz region. I certainly urge, Mr. Speaker, upon the Department of Agriculture that it take into consideration the enormous cost to this great country of ours if that dreadful disease ever enters into our country. We cannot afford to take even a minute chance of this happening.

I surely hope, Mr. Speaker, that a careful study of this entire situation will be made, and if Mexican beef should be permitted entry into the United States, regardless of what form it may be in, the Congress of the United States should make the decision.

DISTORTED FIGURES ON THE WALLS OF THE HOUSE CHAMBER

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in looking around the walls of this House, or, I should say at the ceiling, a stranger might think we were meeting in the Pyramids of Egypt, from the appearance of these antiquated figures.

The distorted imitation of the American eagle that has been placed overhead looks as if it might have been stepped upon by Joe Stalin. It does not even resemble the American eagle as it appears on the Seal of the United States, which that figure is supposed to represent.

It is my intention to introduce a resolution to remove those ghastly placards, which I understand are composed of plaster of paris, and put the figures of great Americans in their places—those great patriots who helped to establish and build this Republic.

I would like to remove the figure of Napoleon and put that of glorious old Benjamin Franklin in its place.

That so-called likeness of Crotius might be replaced by John Adams, or Alexander Hamilton. Innocent III might be replaced by Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the great signers of the Declaration of Independence.

That supposed likeness of Suleiman might be replaced by James Monroe.

Then, there is the figure of Caius, it is a wonder they had not put "Confusion" right after it. We might put Andrew Jackson in his place; and replace that figure of Papinian up yonder with that of Martin Van Buren; and that figure of Solon which you see yonder might very appropriately be replaced with that of John Marshall.

And other great American leaders including ex-Presidents, might take the places now occupied by the picture of Hammurabi, Alfonso X, Edward I, Pothier, Colbert, Lycurgus, and all the other representatives of the pre-Christian era—with the exception of Moses. I would let Moses stay, because he is the man who brought down from Sinai the Ten Commandments that are being so ruthlessly ignored or violated by the enemies of this Government—at home and abroad.

Then, if I could reach a compromise with our Republican colleagues, in addition to the other figures, I would place the figures of Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis, as well as that of Ulysses S. Grant and Robert E. Lee in conspicuous places and follow them up with other American presidents, at least down to the turn of the century.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is one great American's name up there.

Mr. RANKIN Two—Jefferson and Mason.

Mr. MASON. And that one is Mason, and the one over there is Jefferson.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, the only two they have from Virginia—or from America. But I will take care of all the States, and the American Republic, if the rest of you will go along with me.

Remember this is the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and not a sanctuary of antiquity, or the tomb of King Tut.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House on Monday and Tuesday next for 10 minutes, at the conclusion of the legislative program of those days and following any special orders heretofore entered.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

Mr. HORAN appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I know the majority leader can give me a helpful answer to a question which has to do with our work. We came down here on November 27 and ever since have been pushed hard with the legislative program which was submitted and which the administration seemed determined to get that through the Eighty-first Congress. We even met on January 1, a legal holiday. Bills were put through when no printed copies were available to the Members. Now why is it we are not working tomorrow or Saturday, and how much loafing are we to do next and subsequent weeks? I suppose the answer will be that the standing committees have not been set up, but that is not at least in my opinion the real answer to the haste in putting through legislation the last few weeks and on the first.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If the gentleman pleases.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Michigan is so wise that he is possessed of all the wisdom in the world, in his own opinion. The gentleman knows that at the outset of a new Congress it requires some period to organize.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have the answer. I thank the gentleman for his answer and for his courtesy. Of course, the real reason is that the administration wanted the Eighty-first Congress rather than the Congress elected in November to put that legislation over. The gentleman knew he could not get it over in the new Congress in the same form it passed the Eighty-first Congress. That is the reason.

Mr. McCORMACK. The effort of the gentleman from Michigan does not represent the views of his Republican colleagues, I know that. My remarks are confined to him. It is nothing but a small, cheap effort to get some publicity.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. At least I never attempted to represent my colleagues, and I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. His remarks show his willingness to cooperate.

JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement.

After consultation with the majority and minority leaders, and remembering the terrific jams we have had upon the floor upon the occasion of appearances by the President of the United States at joint sessions of the Congress, with the consent and approval of the floor leaders the Chair announces that on Monday, January 8, the doors immediately opposite the Speaker will be open and the doors on the Speaker's left and right, and none other.

No one will be allowed upon the floor of the House on that day who does not have the privilege of the floor of the House.

Further, on account of suggestions that have been made, there will be no seats in the aisles of the gallery. This is done for reasons that are not necessary to explain. Also, no children will be allowed on the floor, because they do not have the privilege of the floor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROONEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article by Hon. CLARENCE CANNON, of Missouri, published in the the Tax Review for December 1950, with an editorial from the Washington Star.

Mr. WILLIS asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks.

Mr. HELLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in six instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. EVINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. ABERNETHY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and to include a letter and an editorial.

Mr. JENKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. DOLLIVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter from a constituent concerning price controls on meat.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HOPE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. SMITH of Kansas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances.

Mr. LARCADE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial appearing in the New York Times relating to his former colleague, Mrs. Norton.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in two instances and include an article appearing in the Lowell Sun.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BARTLETT, for 10 days, on account of official business.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, January 8, 1951, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

19. A letter from the Under Secretary, Department of Agriculture, transmitting the report on cooperation of the United States with Mexico in the control and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease under the terms of that law for the month of November 1950; to the Committee on Agriculture.

20. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Trade Commission, transmitting the report of the Federal Trade Commission entitled "International Cartels in the Alkali Industry"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

21. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Trade Commission, transmitting the report of the Federal Trade Commission entitled "The Divergence Between Plant and Company Concentration, 1947"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

22. A letter from the Chief Justice, Supreme Court of the United States, transmitting reports of the regular annual meeting and a special meeting of the Judicial Conference of the United States held at Washington, D. C., September 25–27, 1950, and March 9, 1950, pursuant to the provisions of title 28, United States Code, section 331 (H. Doc. No. 32); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

23. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting the report on the audit of Tennessee Valley Authority for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950 (H. Doc. No. 33); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

24. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting the report on the audit of Virgin Islands Corporation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1951 (H. Doc. No. 34); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

25. A letter from the Administrator of Veteran's Affairs, transmitting the annual report of activities of the Veterans' Administration as of June 30, 1950, pursuant to provisions of section 6 (c) of the act of July 3, 1930 (Public Law No. 536, 71st Cong.), and section 1504 of the act of June 22, 1944 (Public Law No. 346, 78th Cong.) (H. Doc. No. 8); to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1. By Mr. POLK: Resolution of Matthews-Carter Post, No. 325, American Legion, Manchester, Ohio, signed by W. R. Pownall, commander, and George Wisecup, adjutant, urging that Congress increase compensation, pensions, and allotments for dependents to compensate for the high cost of living; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

2. By Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin: Resolution of the executive council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress assembled in session at Stevens Point, Wis., December 9, 1950, opposing importation of furs from Russia and its satellites into United States and Canada; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 1951

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 3, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God our Father, as we rejoice at the gift of another day may its hours be made luminous by Thy presence, who art the light of all our seeing. In everything we are called to do may we be at our best, and so be worthy of our high calling.

Grant us the spirit of kindliness, of thoughtfulness, and of fair play in all our relationships. Deliver us from all malice and contempt, lest we hurt others and sour our own souls. May the tyranny of partisanship and expediency never bend our conscience to low aims which betray high principles.

Hear Thou our prayer as out of the depths we cry as we climb the world's great altar stairs which slope through darkness up to Thee. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 3, 1951, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Snader, its assistant reading clerk, informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives had assembled; that Hon. SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas, had been elected Speaker; and Ralph R. Roberts, a citizen of the State of Indiana, had been elected Clerk of the House of the Eighty-second Congress.

The message announced that a committee of three Members had been appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with the committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House had assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) providing for a joint session of the two Houses at 1 o'clock p. m. on Monday, January 8, 1951, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. McFARLAND and Mr. WHERRY advanced in the middle aisle, and Mr. MCFARLAND said: Mr. President, the committee appointed on the part of the Senate in conjunction with a similar committee on the part of the House, has waited upon the President of the United States and informed him that the Congress is now in session and ready to proceed to business. The President sends his felicitations, and requests the committee to inform the Senate that he desires to address a joint meeting of the Congress on Monday next at 1 o'clock.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES TO HEAR THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL ADDRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution coming over from the House of Representatives which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 8th day of January 1951, at 1 o'clock post-meridian, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On request of Mr. O'MAHONEY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. HUNT was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate today because of illness.

TRANSACTION OF BUSINESS PRIOR TO THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL ADDRESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, at the last meeting of the Senate, a discussion was had with regard to the transaction of business prior to the delivery by the President of the United States of his annual message. I do not regard the placing of matters in the RECORD and speeches as the transaction of business. For that reason I am perfectly willing that matters be inserted in the RECORD and that speeches be made.

When the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] informed me that he wanted to address the Senate I told him I thought he ought to be entitled to tell the President what he ought to say in his message next Monday, and I did not want to deprive the Senator from Ohio of that privilege. So I ask unanimous consent that Senators may be permitted to place matters in the RECORD, and we will then, of course, be happy to hear the Senator from Ohio with regard to what he thinks the President should place in his message to the Congress.

Mr. TAFT. And any other Senators, I hope.

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes; any other Senators. I do not want to confine it to my good friend from Ohio because we are a democratic body and any other Senator who wants to address the Senate should have the opportunity.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator from Arizona in his request include the introduction of bills?

Mr. McFARLAND. As I stated yesterday, the committees have not as yet been appointed and the Senate is not organized; so it would be useless to introduce bills at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to clarify the parliamentary situation in that regard. The Senate met today following a recess. Therefore there is no morning hour. Under those conditions matters may not be inserted in the RECORD except by unanimous consent. Bills or resolutions may not be introduced, and no business may be transacted without unanimous consent. Of course, if a Senator wished to make the point, he could object even to the insertion of routine matters in the RECORD, which are regarded as transaction of business in the sense that after such business has been transacted a quorum call would be in order.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND] is asking for unanimous consent that all Senators be permitted to insert matters in the RECORD, including petitions and memorials, which by unanimous consent, would be in order under that category if we were in the morning hour. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I did not intend to include petitions and memorials. I referred merely to the insertion of matters in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was merely commenting on the fact that under the heading of petitions and memorials insertions in the RECORD are usually the order of business. However, the Chair will limit the request to insertions in the RECORD, not including petitions and memorials. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there is no objection to the request. However,

I should like to point out to the distinguished Vice President that speeches are not considered as business, and speeches are included in the unanimous-consent request, if Senators should wish to take advantage of the opportunity.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I take it that it is not necessary to ask for unanimous consent to make a speech. I was merely announcing that I thought the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] should be entitled to advise the President. I do not think there will be any objection.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, before the Senator from Ohio advises the President, I should like to ask unanimous consent to make an insertion in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair wishes to add the comment that under the parliamentary rules and precedents speeches are not regarded as the transaction of business. In other words, if no business has been transacted after a quorum call, except the delivery of speeches, another quorum call could not be immediately requested in order to transact business.

ECONOMIC PROBLEMS OF MOBILIZATION

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am in complete accord with the observations of the distinguished Vice President. I now ask unanimous consent to call attention to and also to insert in the RECORD as part of my statement an editorial published in the Omaha World-Herald. First I should like to make some observations about the editorial.

The people of the great agricultural Midwest, like all loyal Americans, are gravely concerned by and earnestly seeking solutions for the crisis which confronts the United States.

They are prepared to carry their full share of the burden, however great may be the job of preserving freedom and security.

On the international front they are vigorously expressing their opinions and, quite rightfully, I believe, they are demanding new policies more constructive than those that have led us into military danger and diplomatic disadvantage.

At the same time, they are measuring the problems of national emergency, as they affect our domestic economy, and are girding themselves to contribute to the safety and expansion of our economy as conditions require.

One of the most provocative suggestions to come out of this midwestern thinking on the economic problems of mobilization is a suggestion for the suspension of the farm price support program during the period of emergency.

This is a most serious question, with so many ramifications that it cannot be accepted or rejected without thorough study and mature consideration. But, certainly, it speaks well for the sincerity and honesty of the agricultural sections of the Nation, that such a suggestion should come from those most directly affected.

The proposal for suspension of the Federal farm price program was given voice in an editorial in the Wednesday editions of the Omaha World-Herald. So that it can be brought to the attention of all Members of Congress and be available for their consideration, I ask unanimous consent that it be included as part of my remarks and printed in full as a statement at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO FARM CONGRESSMEN: A CHANCE TO LEAD

The men who represent the Farm Belt in the Eighty-second Congress have a chance to perform a great service for the Republic, one which will cause their names to be blessed.

This is it:

They should take the lead in demanding that the price-support program of the Department of Agriculture be suspended for the duration of the national emergency.

If such a move were to originate with the men who represent the corn country, and the wheat country and the butter-and-egg country, it would go through a whooping.

We recommend the idea to Senators WHERRY and BUTLER of Nebraska, and HICKENLOOPER and GILLETTE of Iowa. We commend it also to the Representatives of those two States. Here is a chance to show the world that in at least one area of this country there are men who put patriotism ahead of hand-outs.

It should be abundantly clear to everybody that the need for these clumsy give-away schemes has passed.

Low prices and surpluses are no longer a problem. Instead, the planners are talking about shortages—about the need for vastly greater production, and the twin problem of keeping prices down.

Perhaps the greatest shortage of all will be in manpower.

So why should the Government, through hand-out programs, hire men to grow things which aren't wanted?

Why waste manpower and acres in producing stuff which will be stored away in caves until it rots?

Why hire one bunch of bureaucrats to keep prices high, and another bunch to bring prices down?

It doesn't make sense.

Actually this reform would not require an extraordinary amount of political courage. A number of leading farm organizations already are on record against price supports.

The American Farm Bureau Federation, at its convention last month, said:

"In the year ahead * * * farm prices will be supported by the firm demand of a mobilizing economy. Under such conditions, the need for price supports, acreage allotments, and marketing quotas on certain commodities is greatly reduced. We believe that such programs should be suspended, as the law provides and as conditions permit."

The National Grange at its autumn convention reiterated its belief that the price-support system is a faulty method of dealing with surpluses of both the so-called basic crops and the perishables.

Not only these leading farm organizations, but a number of lesser ones, including organizations of potato growers, have taken the same stand.

If they are willing to dispense with hand-outs, what is Congress waiting for?

How much money could be saved by wiping out price supports?

Nobody knows for sure. The bookkeeping is so complicated (perhaps by design) that the loss can't be figured exactly.

However, Senator AIKEN, of Vermont, who is better informed than most on this matter, once opined that the whole support program cost $1,000,000,000 in 1949. The 1950 cost may have been even higher.

Whatever the amount, it should be saved in 1951.

The wasted dollars should be put in the defense program.

The manpower that has been used to process and store surplus crops should be released for war duty.

The PMA and CCC bureaucrats should be taken off the farmers' backs and allowed to find useful jobs.

The Congressmen from the black-soil States, we repeat, have a chance to perform a great service for their country.

OUR MILITARY AND DEFENSE NEEDS

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert three newspaper articles in the body of the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for 1 minute in connection with the articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, on numerous occasions in the Eighty-first Congress, particularly subsequent to the new war in Asia, I said that it was imperative that we reduce all expenditures not related to our military and defense needs.

Although every Member of the Senate knows full well the crying need for action which will attain essential economies so necessary to meet the impact of the new war, it is fitting and proper that we be reminded again and again that we have yet to act on an over-all program to conserve Federal payrolls and to cut nondefense spending.

I shall have much more to say on this whole subject as this session progresses, but rather than trespass at any length on the Senate's time in these opening days, I will speak only through three newspaper articles. The first one is an editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of Thursday, December 28, 1950, entitled "Nondefense Spending Must Be Cut." The second is an article from the Washington Star of Tuesday, January 2, 1951, by Joseph Young, entitled "United States Staff Called Too Large for Peak Efficiency," and the third is an editorial from the Washington Star of Wednesday, January 3, 1951.

Mr. President, I am convinced that these articles express the sentiment of the American people in this hour of crisis.

I ask unanimous consent that they be incorporated in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks in the hope that they will be carefully read by every Member of the Senate of the United States.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of December 28, 1950]

NONDEFENSE SPENDING MUST BE CUT

President Truman's intimation that there will be still higher taxes in store for the American people once more points up the glaring necessity for a rigid program of efficiency and economy in the Government which will leave no room for vast spending unrelated to the defense effort.

It is clear that heavier taxes will be required to pay for the rebuilding of our military strength. The $7,700,000,000 expected to be levied by this Congress may be only the beginning; it is evident that even the administration does not know at this time how much more will be required.

But there should no longer be any question that these new and burdensome taxes must be accompanied by firm measures to insure that the taxpayers are getting their money's worth, and to provide unmistakable assurance that the additional taxes are not merely paying for continued waste and inefficiency in the Government.

In recent weeks there have been encouraging reports showing that the Government can save substantial sums of money if officials are willing—or are forced—to make the effort.

Various reorganization plans recommended by the Hoover Commission have been made into law in the past 2 years. The resulting economies from these moves will approach, according to the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, $2,000,000,000 a year.

Another aspect of this reorganization program was emphasized by the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. On improved management procedures alone Government agencies already have saved $5,000,000 a year. That is a drop in the bucket, considering the huge expenses of the Government, but it shows what can be done.

It not only can be done, but it must be done. Now, with spending necessary to strengthen our country increasing every day, it is imperative for our economic stability and for the welfare of the taxpayers that every item of nonessential spending be eliminated.

Only about half of the reforms recommended by the Hoover Commission have been put into effect. With the Nation bending every effort toward defense, there is a tendency to forget the remaining half.

Yet efficiency is more vital than ever. It is needed to provide guaranties that the money appropriated for defense is not wasted. It is needed to get rid of the duplication and waste that slow down nondefense arms of the Government. The way to instill efficiency where it is needed is to enact the rest of the Hoover Commission program.

There is still a tremendous amount of waste in the Agriculture Department, which has not applied any of the suggestions made by the Hoover group. The post office, furnishing poorer service than before, still has not been modernized or freed from politics, as the Commission recommended. Other departments, either because their heads refused to act, or because Congress blocked reorganization plans, have a long way to go to root out costly waste.

But Congress can do more than pass the rest of the Hoover Commission recommendations. There are many large items in the budget which would be desirable enough in peacetime, but should be postponed when the country is saddled with vast burdens stemming from the defense program.

There has been a great deal of talk, in Congress and the executive branch, about cutting down on nondefense spending. In his speech to the Nation recently, President Truman said that he was ordering all department heads to reduce nondefense items.

It is time that order was carried out to the letter. With defense requirements placing unprecedented burdens on all Americans, the new Congress and the President should furnish ironclad proof that ruthless pruning of nonessential spending will precede any action on higher taxes.

UNITED STATES STAFF CALLED TOO LARGE FOR PEAK EFFICIENCY—HOUSE SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT IS MILDER THAN EARLIER ONES

(By Joseph Young)

The Government, in general, could do a better job with fewer employees, a House Civil Service Subcommittee declared today in issuing its final report on its investigation of Government personnel practices.

The report, however, was milder in comparison with findings of similar congressional studies of past years, and also had some words of praise for Federal officials and employees.

Committee members believe this more restrained type of report can do more good in the long run by enlisting the friendly cooperation of Federal departments and agencies in following the subcommittee's recommendations for improving the situation.

AGENCY HEADS CRITICIZED

The report did criticize sharply the Government's Cabinet officials and agency heads for failing to take enough of an active part in their departments' and agencies' personnel operations.

The group recommended that—

1. The heads of all departments and agencies make a thorough study of the personnel activities under their direction, with a view to eliminating overlapping and duplicating functions. Organizaton structure should be simplified.

2. All functions not directly related to the defense effort should be reappraised with a view toward reduction or complete elimination.

3. Agency and department heads should exercise strong central control over their personnel and administrative operations.

They should devote a lot more time to active supervision of the subordinate operations within their respective assignments.

CONTINUING STUDY URGED

4. Excess personnel should be transferred to defense agencies which need them.

5. Congress should set up a continuing committee to follow up on the subcommittee's recommendations and determine whether the Government's executive branch is following them.

In its general findings of Federal personnel in nondefense agencies, the subcommittee declared:

"The subcommittee finds that, in general, executive agencies could do a better job with fewer employees. In many respects they have not fully recovered from the ill effects of the World War II period. Elaborate staffing requirements still exist. Work habits are relaxed from the all-out effort which formerly prevailed."

DUPLICATION POINTED OUT

"Although some new nondefense activities have been added to the normal prewar workload, they are not sufficient to take up the slack. Functional duties have not been altered in conformance with postwar conditions. Improved methods and labor-saving techniques have not been placed in general practice.

"Reorganization to eliminate duplicate and overlapping activities has not been completed. Overhead administrative costs have increased sharply. The retrenchment from a peak period of wartime employment has not been fully carried out. The cost consciousness which prevailed in the prewar period has not been restored. The full capacity and myriad talents of the Federal work force are not properly utilized."

The subcommittee, which did not investigate the defense agencies, declared that the "need for vigilance in the practice of economy and efficiency in Government becomes increasingly self-evident in periods of national emergency." Recent events make it essential the Government make optimum use of all available manpower, especially in the nondefense operations, the group added.

COOPERATION PRAISED

The subcommittee made full-scale investigations in the Treasury, Interior, and Labor Departments, and the Federal Security Agency and the General Services Administration. It also received data from the Agriculture, Commerce, Justice, and State Departments and the Veterans' Administration.

The group praised the "wholehearted cooperation" that Federal employees gave them in connection with the investigation, even when in many instances "this entailed the submission of self-damaging information in spite of the possibility of reprisal."

"The subcommittee wishes to acknowledge and express its sincere appreciation for this assistance," the report declared. It has not only increased the accuracy of these reports, but it has also enhanced the subcommittee's belief that the vast majority of thoughtful Federal employees are increasingly anxious to support any effort which holds promise of improvement.

[From the Washington Star of January 3, 1951]

SPOTLIGHT ON OVERSTAFFING

Evidence of overstaffing in the Government uncovered by a House Civil Service subcommittee indicates the need for a continuing scrutiny of what the subcommittee calls "employee utilization" in the Federal departments and independent agencies. Chairman WILLIAMS and his group state bluntly "that, in general, executive agencies could do a better job with fewer employees." They were supported in this conclusion by frank admissions from within the agencies themselves that there has been waste of personnel and money. Promises to correct some of the conditions complained of by subcommittee investigators have been obtained, but promises have not always produced results in the past. The promises need to be followed up by some such congressional group as that which has started the ball rolling.

The subcommittee believes that present overstaffing practices in nondefense agencies are an aftermath of World War II, when offices only remotely related to the war effort expanded without regard to cost or efficiency of operation. When the letdown came there was a tendency to hold on to activities and personnel not really needed. Despite criticisms in the past by congressional committees and by the Hoover Commission, there was still a lot of surplus fat to be trimmed from the departments as the new national emergency developed. The possibility exists that some nondefense agencies will use the emergency as an excuse to retain employees that could be used to better advantage in defense jobs.

The President, as the head of the executive establishment, can help to arrest this tendency by supporting the subcommittee's proposal for a comprehensive reappraisal of all activities not connected directly with the remobilization program. The Williams subcommittee dug deep enough to convince it that such a review would turn up plenty of places for retrenchment, with consequent savings in personnel, and funds. These improperly utilized employees and dollars are urgently needed elsewhere in the Government—specifically in the Defense Department and the agencies collaterally assisting in the defense effort. It is an inexcusable extravagance to take on new employees when there are experienced workers already on the Federal payroll with not enough to do.

AMENDMENT OF REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1949

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a bill which I propose to introduce on behalf of myself and other members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments as soon as the introduction of bills may be in order.

I ask also that there be printed immediately following the text of the bill an explanation of it.

There being no objection, the bill and accompanying explanation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Reorganization Act of 1949 (63 Stat. 203) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"TITLE III

"SEC. 301. During the time that this title is in force, and for any of the following purposes, but only in matters related to the national security or defense, namely, any of the purposes set forth in section 2 (a) hereof; the promotion of the national security or defense; the support and maintenance of the Armed Forces, the better utilization of resources and industries; the more effective exercise and the more efficient administration by the President of his functions as Chief Executive and as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces; or the better coordination of agencies and their functions; the President is hereby authorized to transmit to the Congress, under this title, reorganization plans which shall, except as provided in this title, be governed by the provisions of titles I and II of this act.

"SEC. 302. Each reorganization plan transmitted to the Congress under this title shall—

"(a) be certified by the President as submitted under this title;

"(b) be identified as being temporary;

"(c) become effective in accordance with the provisions of section 6 hereof, except that a period of 15 days prior to taking effect shall obtain in lieu of the 60 days specified in the said section 6; and

"(d) remain in force only until the termination of this title or until otherwise made inapplicable by or pursuant to law.

"SEC. 303. (a) In addition to the matters specified in titles I and II hereof, any reorganization plan under this title may provide for either or both of the following, which shall for the purposes of this title be deemed to be reorganizations:

"(1) The extension of any function of any agency to any other agency; and

"(2) The utilization of the facilities, services, or personnel of any agency.

"(b) The President may include in any reorganization plan transmitted under this title provisions for the appointment of officers and other personnel in such manner as the President shall specify.

"(c) There may be omitted from the message of the President transmitting any reorganization plan under this title reference to the probable reduction of expenditures to be brought about by the plan (provided in section 3 of this act).

"(d) No reorganization plan under this title shall provide for, and no reorganization under this title shall have the effect of—

"(1) abolishing or transferring an executive department or all of the functions thereof or establishing any new executive department; or

"(2) changing the name of any executive department or the title of its head, or designating any agency as 'Department' or its head as 'Secretary'; or

"(3) abolishing, transferring, or consolidating the whole or any part of the civil functions of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army.

"SEC. 304. Upon the termination of this title all functions, agencies, property, personnel, records, and funds affected by any reorganization plan then in force under the provisions of this title shall have such organizational status as may heretofore or hereafter be provided by law or by reorganization plan under titles I and II hereof.

"SEC. 305. This title shall terminate on June 30, 1952, or on the termination of the national emergency proclaimed by the President on December 16, 1950, or on a termination date designated by concurrent resolution of the Congress or by the President, whichever date is the earliest.

"SEC. 306. This title may be cited as the 'Defense Organization Act of 1951'."

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED TITLE III OF THE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1949

In general, this bill, which adds a new title III to the Reorganization Act of 1949, authorizes the President to transmit to the Congress temporary reorganization plans. These reorganization plans would be along the lines of reorganization plans authorized by the present Reorganization Act of 1949 except for certain differences specified in the proposed title III. These differences are brought out in the following review of the various sections of the proposed title III.

SECTION 301

This section prescribes the purposes for which a reorganization plan may be submitted under the proposed title III. Those purposes include the purposes set forth in section 2 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1949 and also include—with adaptations appropriate to an emergency situation as contrasted with a state of war—the purposes covered by title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941.

Section 301 also requires that reorganization plans submitted under the proposed title III shall be governed by the provisions of titles I and II of the Reorganization Act of 1949 except as otherwise provided in the proposed title III.

SECTION 302

This section requires that each reorganization plan transmitted by the President to the Congress under title III shall be identified as being temporary.

The section further prescribes that the period available to the Congress to reject a reorganization plan transmitted by the President under title III shall be 15 days in lieu of the 60-day period specified in section 6 of the Reorganization Act of 1949. The purpose of this provision is to meet the need for rapid action during the emergency period.

The section also limits the effective period of a reorganization plan becoming effective under title III to the period ending with the termination of the title. The section recognizes that a reorganization plan may become inoperative at an earlier date by or pursuant to law.

The Reorganization Act of 1949 now provides for specified forms of reorganization, namely, transfer, consolidation, coordination, delegation, and abolition. Section 303 would provide for two additional forms of reorganization.

Section 303 (a)(1) would permit the inclusion in a reorganization plan under title III of a reorganization which would extend any function of any agency to any other agency. While this is in some respects comparable to a transfer of function, it differs in that the agency having the function in the first place is not divested thereof but the function in question is, in effect, shared with one or more other agencies. While this was accomplished a number of times under title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941, it is not apparent that it could be done under the Reorganization Act of 1949 unless suitable provision be made therefor by law.

An example of a transaction of this nature may be found in connection with the duty-free entry of materials under the authority of 34 U. S. C. 568. That provision of law authorizes the Navy Department to bring in materials free of duty and without customs inspection. Such authority was extended as follows under the authority of title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941: To various agencies by Executive Order 9177; to the United States Maritime Commission by Executive Order 9495; to the Department of Commerce by Executive Order 9768; to the Atomic Energy Commission by Executive Order 9829 (still in effect). The ability to avoid customs inspection is probably the primary consideration, and the duty-free entry secondary.

A further example of the extension of a function from one agency to another may be found in Executive Order No. 9440, authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to place orders with other agencies for materials or services to be obtained by contract or otherwise.

Section 303 (a) (2) would permit the inclusion in a reorganization plan under title III of a reorganization consisting of the utilization of the facilities, services, or personnel of any agency. This form of reorganization would not appear to be covered by title I of the Reorganization Act of 1949. However, section 2 of the First War Powers Act, 1941, authorized the President "to utilize * * * any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, governmental corporations, offices or officers now existing by law." The intent of section 303 (a) (2) is the same as that of the quoted language (and it is possible that revision of the text of 303 (a) (2) to accord more nearly with the quoted words would be advantageous).

It is believed desirable that the President have the authority to utilize facilities of the Government in connection with the defense effort and that, accordingly, provision along the lines of section 303 (a) (2) is necessary. Further, that this provision is important can be illustrated by reference to a case involving the Office of Temporary Controls which was decided by the Supreme Court. The Government's position was upheld partly on the ground that the President had utilized an officer of the Government (the Federal Works Administrator) and that such utilization was provided for in title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941.

Section 303 (b) would authorize the President to include in a reorganization plan under title III provisions for the appointment of an official without Senate confirmation. While it is expected that a number of officials conducting the defense program would be confirmed by the Senate—as is the Director of Mobilization (Mr. Wilson)—there may also be expected to be numerous other officials, particularly those of a lesser status, with respect to whom confirmation by the Senate would not seem necessary. In any event, the President was not limited in this respect during World War II, and numerous officials were provided for by the President, in whole or in part pursuant to title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941, without provision for confirmation by the Senate.

Section 3 of the Reorganization Act of 1949 requires, in substance, that the President include in the message transmitting any reorganization plan an estimate of the reduction of expenditures which it is probable will be brought about by the taking effect of the reorganization plan. Section 303 (c) of the proposed title III would make this requirement inapplicable to temporary reorganization plans made under title III. It is believed that it will in most instances scarcely be feasible to make an estimate of any value with respect to the reduction of expenditures to be brought about by reorganization plan under title III. Indeed, it is more likely that title III would be utilized in connection with an expanding defense program, at least initially, and that the expenditures would be on the rise instead of decreasing. It does not appear that any useful purpose is served by requiring the President either to attempt to make a rather unrealistic estimate or to make a declaration that the making of such an estimate is not feasible, in connection with the transmittal of each reorganization plan.

Section 303 (d) provides that no reorganization plan may be submitted under this title which would abolish or transfer the functions of any executive department or create any new executive department, or which would abolish, transfer, or consolidate the civil functions of the Corps of Engineers.

SECTION 304

Consonant with the temporary character of title III, section 304, provides for the reversion to the prior status of the functions, agencies, and other matters effected by reorganization plan under title III upon the termination of such title. The section recognizes that an intervening change may have been made by or pursuant to law, and that any such change shall prevail upon the termination of title III.

SECTION 305

This section provides that title III will terminate on June 30, 1952, or on the termination of the national emergency proclaimed by the President, or on such other termination date as may be designated by concurrent resolution of the Congress or by the President. The Reorganization Act of 1949 terminates automatically on April 1, 1953, and this section will require the reexamination by the Congress before the extension of the powers granted herein.

SECTION 306

This section provides a short title for the proposed title III, namely, "Defense Organization Act of 1951."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the bill is designed to give to the President certain powers which he has requested, I believe, in his message of December 16 or 18, with reference to restoring the powers under title I of the War Powers Act of 1941.

We approach that problem in this bill by adding another title, title III, to the Reorganization Act. Title III permits organizations to be made on a temporary basis during the period of this emergency, but it retains in the Congress the same opportunity to scrutinize and pass upon proposed reorganizations during the period of the emergency.

I am asking that this be done in order that Senators who are interested may have an opportunity to study the bill and give to me or to other members of my committee any suggestions they may have with reference to it. This is a subject which we should consider early in the session. As soon as it is in order to introduce bills, I shall introduce this bill and call hearings on it immediately.

GOVERNOR OF TERRITORY OF ALASKA

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD the contents of a bill which I intend to introduce in the next few days with reference to amendments of the organic act relating to Alaska, permitting a change which would enable the people of Alaska to elect their own Governor, together with an article headed "Error found in proposed '51–52 budget," published in the Ketchikan (Alaska) Chronicle of December 22, 1950; an article headed "Grins and groans—Why not election of Governor?", published in the Ketchikan (Alaska) News; an article headed "First things first," published in the Fairbanks (Alaska) Daily News-Miner, January 2, 1951; an article headed "Why not elect our own Governor?", published in the Anchorage (Alaska) Daily News, December 26, 1950; as well as a statement prepared by me bearing on the subject.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1900, is amended by inserting after section 2 thereof two new sections as follows:

"SEC. 2A. (a) At the general election in 1952 and at each quadrennial general election thereafter, the governor of the Territory of Alaska shall be elected by the qualified voters of Alaska and shall hold office for a term of 4 years commencing on the second day of January following the date of the election and until his successor is elected and qualified. No person shall be eligible for the office of governor unless at the time of his taking office he is at least 30 years of age, is a citizen of the Territory of Alaska, and has resided therein for at least 3 years next preceding the date of his taking office. The election of the Governor shall be held in the same manner provided by law for the election of the Delegate from the Territory of Alaska to the House of Representatives of the United States.

"(b) The governor (other than a governor appointed by the President) shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. The House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska shall have the sole power of impeachment. Impeachment shall require the concurrence of two-thirds of all of the members of the house of representatives. The Senate of Alaska shall have the sole power to try all impeachments and when sitting for that purpose, the members of the senate shall be on oath or affirmation. No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of three-fourths of all the members of the senate. Judgment in the cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the government of the Territory. Any person convicted shall, nevertheless, be subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

"SEC. 2B. (a) The governor shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of Alaska, appoint the secretary of the Territory of Alaska, who shall hold office for 4 years and until his successor is appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of Alaska.

"(b) In case of a vacancy in the office of governor, the person holding the position of secretary of the Territory of Alaska at the time the vacancy occurs shall succeed to the office of governor and to all duties and emoluments for the remainder of the term. If for any reason the governor is temporarily absent from Alaska, or unable to perform his duties, the secretary shall act as governor, with all the powers and duties of the office during such absence or disability. In the event that the secretary is unable to succeed to the office of governor or to act as governor, or in the event that the office of secretary is also vacant, such other person as may be provided by the laws of the Territory shall succeed to the office of governor or shall act as governor, as the case may be. In the event that a newly elected governor is unable to take office, a temporary successor shall be elected by a majority vote of all members of the legislature of the Territory meeting in joint session at the next succeeding term thereof, who shall hold office until a successor is elected and qualified at a special election to be held within 120 days from the date of adjournment of such session."

SEC. 2. (a) The first sentence of section 2 of such act of June 6, 1900 (U. S. C., title 48, sec. 61), is amended to read as follows: "The governor of the Territory shall be charged with the interests of the United States Government within the Territory."

(b) The first paragraph of section 10 of such act of June 6, 1900 (U. S. C., title 48, sec. 62) is amended by striking out "governor, surveyor-general."

(c) The second paragraph of section 10 of such act of June 6, 1900, is amended by striking out "The officers so appointed" and inserting in lieu thereof "The officers provided for in this act."

(d) The last paragraph of section 10 of such act of June 6, 1900, is repealed.

(e) The act entitled "An act to further prescribe the duties of the secretary of the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905 (U. S. C., title 48, sec. 42, 65, 66), is amended by striking out the words "the Secretary of the Interior" wherever they appear therein and inserting in lieu thereof "the governor of the Territory."

(f) The amendments made by this section shall become effective on the day on which the first governor elected pursuant to section 2A of the act of June 6, 1900, takes office.

ERROR FOUND IN PROPOSED 1951–52 BUDGET

JUNEAU.—A $3,000,000 error in Alaska's expected deficit for the 1951–53 biennium was pointed out yesterday by Republican Senator-Elect Elton E. Engstrom, of Juneau.

Tax Commissioner M. P. Mullaney later admitted the error and said he would submit a statement with a revised total revenue figure shortly.

The original report from the budget board listed an anticipated deficit of $567,561.28.

Then Engstrom, a fish broker who is familiar with the earnings of fish processors, double-checked—and found a double listing of $3,000,000 by the department of taxation as expected revenue from both fish processors and the salmon cannery license tax.

He brought it to Mullaney's attention, saying the deficit would be closer to $3,500,000.

The total budget requested was $20,128,311.28. Engstrom said the revised revenue figure would be approximately $16,500,000.

GRINS AND GROANS—WHY NOT ELECTION OF GOVERNOR?

We understand that Delegate E. L. BARTLETT has announced his intention of opposing any bill which would give Alaskans the right to elect their own Governor on the grounds that it would interfere with Alaska's chances for immediate statehood.

Try as we will we cannot go along with this line of reasoning. In the first place our Delegate over 2 years ago pledged his unqualified support to such a bill only to pull strings to have it shelved at the first opportunity. If that bill had been acted on at that time Alaska today would have been working with a Governor elected by the people of the Territory and one who had their absolute trust and support. We do not believe that Delegate BARTLETT was working for the best interests of the people who elected him when he sabotaged the bill.

Now with the proposed statehood bill failing by its own weight and the bungling of those who claimed to be all out for it we find our duly elected Delegate again going all out to attempt to scuttle a bill giving us a chance to elect our own Governor on the grounds that such a measure would "hurt" our chances for statehood. We feel that Delegate BARTLETT is deliberately abandoning his obligation to the people of the Territory in order to keep Federal Appointee Ernest Gruening on the job. The results of the last election bear out the fact that Republicans and Democrats alike repudiated Governor Gruening for working against the best interests of Alaska and we predict that they will eventually repudiate BARTLETT for the same reasons if he continues on his present course.

In the first place the bill giving us the right to elect our Governor would not conflict or interfere with the statehood bill in any manner. Even if the 1951 Senate had a change of heart and voted approval of the statehood bill in January it would still require 2 or 3 or 4 years before the people of Alaska could elect a constitutional convention, draft and approve a State constitution, and receive favorable action from Congress on the work accomplished.

In the meantime if the chance were given us to elect our own Governor this work could be carried on under a man in whom the people have faith and trust. There would be nothing about the bill to prevent Ernest Gruening from filing as a candidate and giving the voters an opportunity to express an opinion about him—but we feel that they would reject him by a larger majority than any man has ever been rejected in Alaska's history. This is probably the reason why BOB BARTLETT is attempting to sabotage the bill.

Federally appointed Gov. Ernest Gruening in his long tenure in office has failed to lead Alaska forward to the position she should hold today. He has proven himself an adept politician and has created a powerful political machine at the expense of the taxpayers but his attitudes and actions have strangled the industrial development of the Territory and divided its people.

There are men here in Alaska who have been here many years and who understand the problems of the country and have the ability to meet them in a forthright manner. Such men have the faith and confidence of the people and the voters should have the absolute right to choose one of them as governor.

BOB BARTLETT is aware of this fact for he has told us so. We sympathize with his present position for he is at the cross roads where he must choose between his loyalty to Gruening or his obligations to the people who voted him into office. We are sure that Alaskans will be watching his choice with interest for they have a great deal at stake.

This much is certain: If BOB BARTLETT has legitimate reasons for opposing a bill granting Alaska the right to elect its own governor the people will give him a close and a fair hearing. On the other hand they are not in the mood to accept the weak-kneed reasoning which was shown in the professional lobbying deal. We sincerely hope that Mr. BARTLETT continues to place the welfare of the people of Alaska above all other interests.

[From the Fairbanks (Alaska) Daily News-Miner of January 2, 1951]

FIRST THINGS FIRST

The stage is set in Washington for the introduction into the Eighty-second Congress of legislation to grant Alaskans the right to elect their own governor.

This is a right already enjoyed by all other Americans and by the people of Puerto Rico—it is a right that has been long in coming to Alaskans and one which is needed now as never before.

Never in her 83 years under the American flag has Alaska so required the wise and understanding leadership of a governor whose primary interest is exercising the will of Alaskans in the administration of Territorial affairs. In the years ahead the Territory will be faced with difficult decisions and knotty problems, and the solution of these problems must come only through the expressed will of the people if Alaskans are to take their rightful place as full-fledged members of the American Republic.

It is unthinkable that the Territory and its people should be deemed incapable of producing and electing their own chief executive, thereby taking a first and wholly logical step toward mastery of their own governmental affairs.

No valid arguments have yet been presented by opponents of this move, but a number of flimsy smoke screens have been set up to becloud the issue.

Principal opponent of legislation providing for the election of the Governor of Alaska is, strangely enough, a man who is himself elected by the people.

Delegate E. L. BARTLETT has refused to endorse or lend his support to the proposed legislation, taking the stand that he will settle for nothing short of statehood. BARTLETT'S affection for federally appointed Ernest Gruening has long been known, but it has never been suspected that this friendship runs so deep as to blind BARTLETT to the desires of the people he represents.

Ernest Gruening would naturally find a gubernatorial election extremely distasteful, and he can be counted upon to exercise all of the power and influence of his political machine to defeat the bill which would bring to an end his Juneau gravy train. Gruening is no doubt very aware of the fact that if his name ever appeared on a ballot he would be laughed out of the Territory by the citizens over whom he has ridden roughshod during his tenure of federally appointed office.

BARTLETT'S action in refusing to support legislation permitting Alaskans the right to rid themselves once and for all of this man is totally unexplainable even to those who voted him into the office of Delegate.

His sole defense for his action is based on his statement:

"I regret that I cannot agree with you that Alaska is only entitled to an elective governor. * * * I stand for an elective governor plus many other things. Some of those changes would be far, far more important than the privilege of electing our own governor."

In other words, having placed the cart before the horse by urging statehood before we have proven we can govern ourselves, BARTLETT refused to permit the horse to be returned to its rightful place. Like a petulant child tutored only to sing one tune, he cries, "I want statehood immediately or nothing at all."

The plain fact of the matter is that the bill to elect our governor would in no way hinder or retard the Senate action on statehood. Even the most ardent proponents of "statehood now" agree that there would be a lapse of years between the time the enabling bill is passed by Congress and the time actual statehood is achieved.

This lapse would be due to the necessity of electing delegates to a constitutional convention who would draft a State constitution, after which this constitution would have to be approved or amended by the Congress of the United States.

Alaskans agree that the major need for statehood lies in the desire of the Territory to be freed from the bureaucratic system of Federal controls by which Alaskan development is now hamstrung. And in the drafting of both, the statehood enabling act and the State constitution, special care must be given to see that this primary aim is accomplished, for without a complete divorcement from present Federal controls statehood would be an empty achievement indeed.

In view of this, does it not seem illogical that the drafting of the statehood enabling act and of the State constitution should be carried out under the direction and supervision of a federally appointed governor? Where is the guaranty or safeguard against perpetuation of the Federal bureaucracy?

Does it not seem more logical and more in the best interests of the Territory that this work be completed under a man elected by the citizens of Alaska—a man who Alaskans know will carry out their expressed desires and wishes?

Alaskans should now—this year—begin laying the solid groundwork of self-government that will lead to statehood by proving themselves capable of maintaining their own house in good order. They must not be misled by job-conscious politicians who attempt to confuse the issue so as to remain securely in office.

The first move in achieving self-government is to urge Congress to pass immediately the bill granting us the right to elect an Alaskan governor.

[From the Anchorage (Alaska) Daily News of December 26, 1950]

WHY NOT ELECT OUR OWN GOVERNOR?

Delegate BARTLETT is only practicing heroics when he says in effect that nothing constructive for Alaska must be done until statehood is granted.

That was the stand he took recently when he was asked to support a bill calling for the election of a governor of Alaska.

Such a move was recently proposed by Senator HUGH BUTLER, the Republican Senator who led the opposition fight against H. R. 331, the Alaska statehood bill.

It might have been expected that Delegate BARTLETT would not feel kindly toward any measure proposed by the Nebraskan Senator, but in denouncing support of BUTLER'S proposed bill Delegate BARTLETT put himself squarely on record as opposing one basic principal of free democracy so far as Alaskans are concerned. He has said in effect that he will block any move allowing Alaskans to use their right of franchise until statehood is granted.

"I regret that I cannot agree with you that Alaska is only entitled to an elective governor," Delegate BARTLETT replied to Senator BUTLER when asked if he would support an elective governor bill in the next session of Congress. "It seems to me that the first step toward statehood was taken a long time ago and the final step preceding statehood occurred on August 12, 1912, when Alaska's Organic Act was signed. In urging statehood now I stand for an elective governor plus many other things. Some of those changes would be far, far more important than the privilege of electing our own governor."

Delegate BARTLETT and the others who made such a valiant and commendable effort for their cause should come down to earth again, forget the grandstand and play the game for the people in the bleachers. Moaning a lost cause now is a pitiful waste of time.

Delegate BARTLETT'S stand is especially puzzling now when 2 years ago he himself pledged unqualified support to an elective governor bill. It was later shelved at his insistence with the reason given that it might harm the cause of statehood.

Clear-thinking people fail to see how a measure to elect our own governor could possibly harm statehood. Statehood will come when the time is ripe and in the meantime a governor, elected by the people, a governor in whom the people of Alaska had faith and confidence, a governor who had Alaska at heart, could do more to aid the cause of statehood than any other form of strategy that could be adopted.

The Ketchikan Daily News has some similar thinking along this line. It said recently:

"In the first place the bill giving us the right to elect our governor would not conflict or interfere with the statehood bill in any manner. Even if the 1951 Senate had a change of heart and voted approval of the statehood bill in January, it would still require 2 or 3 or 4 years before the people of Alaska could elect a constitutional convention, draft and approve a State constitution, and receive favorable action from Congress on the work accomplished. In the meantime if the chance were given us to elect our own governor, this work could be carried on under a man in whom the people have faith and trust. There would be nothing about the bill to prevent Ernest Gruening from filing as a candidate and giving the voters an opportunity to express an opinion about him—but we feel that they would reject him by a larger majority than any man has ever been rejected in Alaska's history. This is probably the reason why BOB BARTLETT is attempting to sabotage the bill."

After all it is silly to say that one group is for statehood and another group is against statehood. Statehood is the ultimate goal for which all right-thinking Alaskans are striving.

But statehood is not the only goal of Alaskans. It has been lost in this first attempt, not because of the Senate filibuster, but because many persons in the Congress of the United States hadn't faith that Alaska was yet ready for statehood.

So let's do away with the rabble-rousing, "statehood-or-else" tactics. Let's turn our energies to constructive things that can be obtained now. There is so much to do before statehood comes.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUTLER

If the question of granting statehood to Alaska is to be brought up again this year, I believe new hearings should be held on the spot in Alaska itself.

Last year the only hearings held were here in Washington, and that made it impossible for most of the opponents of Alaska statehood to appear. Those favoring statehood were able to come all the way to Washington through the good offices of the Alaska Statehood Committee and upon payment of a nominal rate for their transportation by air, but no such opportunity was given to those opposed. Before we pass on Alaska statehood we should investigate conditions on the spot.

At the time such hearings are held I believe we should also study the proposal to give Alaska the right to elect its own governor. I expect to introduce a bill along that line very shortly. My bill would give Alaska all the real advantages of statehood without, at the same time, inflicting an unbearable burden of taxation on the people of the Territory. Since Alaska cannot balance its budget even now under a Territorial status, it is difficult to see how it can hope to do so under statehood.

If a subcommittee should visit Alaska in connection with this matter, I hope it will also go into the question of canceling some of the Federal reservations and opening up those resources for development. I am afraid Alaska will never be able to support statehood unless some steps are taken first toward bringing Alaska's potential resources into productive use. In my judgment that is a far more important problem than the statehood question.

LAUNCHING OF THE KFAR TRUMAN PROJECT IN BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, on January 4, 1951, Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY, Vice President of the United States, and Mrs. Barkley were guests of honor at a dinner marking the golden jubilee of the national Jewish fund and the launching of the Kfar Truman project in Baltimore, Md.

The project will provide a haven for 250 Jewish families with land and other necessities to establish themselves in Israel. A notable feature of the evening preceding the address by the Vice President was the presentation of a certificate stating that 1,000 trees have been planted in Israel in a group named for the late Rabbi Adolph Coblenz, of the Chizuk Amuno congregation, one of Maryland's most respected citizens.

Speaking of Israel, Mr. BARKLEY told of plans to reclaim the Negeb Desert by means of vast, costly irrigation systems, and he praised Israel as "Jewish democracy in action." As a result of several visits to Israel the Vice President is convinced that Israel is once again to become a great nation of the world.

I ask unanimous consent that an item published in the Baltimore News Post may be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BARKLEY SPEAKS HERE AT JEWISH FUND DINNER

(By Edgar Williams)

Vice President ALBEN W. BARKLEY and Mrs. Barkley were guests of honor at a dinner marking the golden jubilee of the national Jewish fund and the launching here of the Kfar Truman project last night at the Lord Baltimore Hotel.

The project will provide a haven for 250 Jewish families with land and other necessaries to establish themselves in Israel and will cost $50,000. Of this total, $30,000 already has been pledged and $1,800 was collected by children.

Notable features of the evening preceding the address by the Vice President included the presentation of a certificate stating that 1,000 trees have been planted in Israel in a group named for the late Rabbi Adolph Coblenz, of Chizuk Amuno Congregation, by Mendel N. Fisher, executive director of the NJF. It was received for the congregation by Milton Fleischer.

CHORUS HEARD

The presentation was followed by several selections by the 42-voice Beth Tfiloh choral group led by Cantor Max Kotlowitz.

Introduced by Alvin Chesiock, general chairman and toastmaster, Mr. BARKLEY started in a light vein with references to his saltless diet prescribed after flying 125,000 miles making political speeches. He added:

"My wife out of loyalty to me has followed the diet. I have lost 25 pounds, but I don't want her to lose anything that I contracted for when we were married."

Becoming more serious, the Vice President said:

"There may be some in this country who want us to withdraw into a cellar whenever the winds start to blow. They seem to think we can come out when the storm has passed and find things as they were."

NOT HIS VIEW

"I'm not one who believes this.

"We can't withdraw ourselves from the world's disturbances and retain leadership."

Speaking of Israel, Mr. BARKLEY told of plans to reclaim the Negeb Desert by means of vast, costly irrigation systems and he praised Israel as "Jewish democracy in action." He declared:

"As the result of several visits, I'm convinced that Israel is once again to become a 'land flowing with milk and honey.'"

There were 700 guests at the dinner.

FOREIGN POLICY—STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], regarding foreign policy.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

During the last week of 1950 the press and radio of the Nation has offered a cloudy, contradictory, and gloomy picture of things to come. The Senator from Washington wishes to briefly quote and reflect on a small handful of recent press and radio dispatches.

On Saturday, December 30, Arthur (Bugs) Baer said:

"Just a year ago, we wrote 1950 was a brand-new mysterious year and there was frost on the crystal ball.

"If 1951 is the year we worried about in 1950 then we were as correct as white tie and tails. That one candle burned us on both ends.

"We're starting a new year. Don't let the other guy finish it."

On December 28 from Tokyo, the Associated Press stated:

"Nearly half a million Chinese and Korean Reds massed along the thirty-eighth parallel today for a big blow that may fall at any hour.

"However, the outnumbered but alert United Nations army is likely to deal the enemy a punishing blow when the Communists unleash this second invasion of South Korea.

"General MacArthur estimated the total Red at 1,350,000 men in Korea or in reserve in Manchuria.

"The United Press said Chinese troops crossed the thirty-eighth parallel in force for the first time and occupies Kaesong, 2 miles northwest of Seoul."

On the same date the same source had this to say:

"Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, new commander of the United States Eighth Army, toured part of the nervous, 150 mile allied front by jeep, as evidence mounted that the Communists, first expected to strike Christmas eve, were ready now.

"Ridgway took over the Allied ground Army Wednesday, after a brief visit with President Rhee, of the Republic of Korea, at the Presidential palace.

"'I aim to stay in Korea,' the new commander told Rhee."

From Ottawa under date of December 29 the Associated Press said this:

"Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent indicated today the Canadian Government is planning to send several fighter squadrons to Europe and said the Army's special force still may go to Korea."

This information is carried in a Daily News editorial on December 28 under the heading "The war Lie can't see."

"American casualties as of December 14 totaled 33,878. That was higher than the combined total of the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, and the War with Mexico.

"Deaths alone numbered 5,870. By the next report that figure probably will exceed Norway's total losses in World War II.

"If these figures do not spell war to Mr. Lie, what would?"

In his speech of last Friday, John Foster Dulles was quoted in the Washington Post as concluding his statement with this:

"The United Nations if it shows that it has the requisite moral courage, should be given the right to determine the fact of aggression so as to insure the Charter goal of armed forces is being used save in the common interest. In such ways the idea of collective security can be given sensible and effective content."

From Belgrade under date of December 29 the Associated Press said this:

"Foreign Minister Edward Kardelj told the Yugoslav Parliament tonight that the world is heading for a third world war.

"He denounced Red China's intervention in Korea as 'bringing the world a step nearer to a new world war' and added:

"'Crossing the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea by Chinese troops places upon the Government of China and all those who support it a mighty responsibility before history.'

"He offered a four-point proposal for peace in Korea:

"1. A cease-fire and maintenance of the thirty-eighth parallel as dividing line between North and South Korea.

"2. Establishment of a UN commission to supervise elections for a government of a united Korea.

"3. Gradual withdrawal of all foreign troops from Korea and the lifting of the 'blockade' of Formosa.

"4. Admission of Red China to the UN."

From Paris under date of December 29 the United Press stated:

"The National Assembly tonight approved a record 740,000,000,000 franc ($2,114,000,000) military budget for next year, including 355,000,000,000 francs ($1,014,000,000) to be spent on France's contribution to the Atlantic Pact Army. * * *

"France has barely started to build the 20-division army she promised her allies as her share in the Atlantic army and, observers feared, it will not be ready in time.

"Supported by United States arms, equipment, and credits next year totaling up to $2,400,000,000, the Government pledged to have divisions trained and equipped by the end of 1951 and the other 10 by the end of 1953.

"But so far French rearmament is mostly on paper. Aside from the budget approved today, all that France has to show in the way of concrete achievements is an increase in the length of military service, from 12 to 18 months.

"Equipment of France's existing five divisions, four of them with American arms, is going forward slowly."

From Oslo, Norway, on December 26 the Associated Press carried this story:

"Secretary General Trygve Lie declared tonight that the United Nations must not give up in Korea even though this determined stand risks involvement in a war with Communist China.

"If the UN is forced into war with China, he said, the blame will rest 'upon those who have been pulling the strings and perhaps hoping for advantages through aggression.'

"Lie, on vacation, spoke over the Norwegian State radio network. He said he had not given up hope for a peaceful solution in Korea, but added that failure of the UN to stop the attack on South Korea would mean an end to UN hopes for achieving its aims in Korea or any other place.

"He said the goal of the UN in Korea is to promote a unified free community governed by the people and to make it possible for Korea to live in peace with her neighbors."

I can give only my own interpretation and judgment of the several dispatches. From my point of view the statement by Secretary General Trygve Lie of the United Nations is deserving of the greatest emphasis and concern.

If Mr. Lie was speaking authoritatively for the United Nations I think he ought to answer some questions which are uppermost in the mind of every thoughtful American.

On the assumption that Mr. Lie knows what he is talking about and that the United Nations forces are to remain in Korea until the blood-drenched and suffering area becomes a unified free community I for one want to ask Mr. Lie this question: From what sources will armed forces be committed in Korea to carry out Mr. Lie's stated objective of forcing the aggressor out of Korea?

General MacArthur has estimated the total Red force at 1,350,000 men in Korea or in reserve in Manchuria. The best information I have concerning our United Nations strength in Korea is that it consists of about 250,000 troops. Of these about 100,000 are South Koreans and 30,000 or less have been provided by free nations other than the United States.

Unless additional troops are provided by the United Nations it is difficult to believe that our forces can drive the aggressor out of Korea. If the present United Nations forces strength remains about as it is there is reason to believe that the aggressor will continue to force the United Nations to retire if the aggressor intends to fully commit his strength.

If Mr. Lie is not able to state that additional troops will soon be provided by member states of the United Nations will he tell America and the world how he expects the free nations to drive the aggressor out of Korea?

The General Assembly is the only principal organ of the United Nations on which all 59 members are represented. In June 53 of these members voted to support a resolution which stated that the Korean aggressor must be defeated and punished. The six members who voted against this resolution were:

1. Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic.
2. Czechoslovakia.
3. Poland.
4. Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.
5. Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.
6. Yugoslavia.

Obviously, no one expected any assistance from these nations which by their negative votes expressed some sympathy or approval for the aggressor's conduct in Korea.

Of the 53 member nations who voted to oppose the Korean aggressor only 13 members, so far as I have been able to determine, have contributed ground forces since the Korean war began in late June 1950.

All of us are familiar with the contribution which has been made to the Korean War by the United States. As of December 14, 1950, 33,878 American casualties had been suffered. As of that date 5,870 Americans had been killed in action.

I shall list the member nations which have contributed troops to the Korean War, together with the total ground forces which I have been informed each has contributed. It stands to reason that every member nation has suffered losses and the stated figures will therefore represent a larger number of allied forces than are presently available for combat.

The member nations and their contingents are as follows:

British	16,573
Australian	1,887
Philippine	1,349
Turkish	5,051
Thailand	1,521
Netherlands	873
Canadian	1,176
French	914
South African	210
New Zealand	273
Swedish	168
Indian	332

A total of these figures stands at 30,327. A resulting fact is that the number of American casualties is greater than the total ground forces contributions made by 52 member states of the United Nations.

Without much comment I wish to list the 40 nations which have thus far made no ground force contributions to the war in Korea: Afganistan, Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Iran, Iraq, Israel (admitted 1949), Lebanon, Liberia, Luxemburg, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen.

What these 40 nations have in being or available as armed forces I do not know. Perhaps Mr. Trygve Lie knows. Certainly he ought to tell us what he knows. If the United States can anticipate ground force contributions from these nations that is one thing and we could plan accordingly. If no help is to be expected from them, or if no additional contributions are to be anticipated from those 12 nations which have already committed some ground forces that is quite another thing and America ought to be advised of what the future situation is actually to be.

Mr. Trygve Lie has publicly stated that the United Nations must remain to be eventually successful in driving the aggressor from Korea. This can only be done by securing larger numbers of troops than are presently committed and no one in authority, including Mr. Lie, has given any tangible evidence of where the fighting forces are to come from.

My last assumption for the moment is that free fighting forces will somehow be found and committed in Korea and that these forces will eventually be strong enough to defeat and drive the aggressor out of Korea. I must therefore ask Mr. Lie another question. Has it been decided by the United Nations that authority will be given to the United Nations commander in chief in the field to destroy the enemy's supply sources and lines of communication even though this demands that bombings take place north of the Yalu River?

As the United Nations forces are successful and move north the problem of defeating the aggressor will become more difficult because the enemy's sources of supply will draw ever closer to his areas of combat.

Unless authority is provided to destroy the enemy's sources of supply the future problem before the United Nations forces will be no different than it was in late November 1950 when our forces were only a few short miles south of the Yalu River and the Manchurian border. Our forces were badly mangled and were required to retreat in great haste during that period because the United Nations policymakers would not authorize General MacArthur to attack the enemy's sources of supply.

If Mr. Trygve Lie, in his broadcast to the world from Oslo, Norway, on December 26, meant that additional United Nations forces would soon be committed in Korea and that the field commander in chief would be permitted and encouraged to use every military weapon and to go anywhere to destroy the enemy, one could logically assume that the possibility for a complete Korean victory would be present.

If, however, Mr. Trygve Lie meant that we shall be required to continue to fight with inadequate forces and without authority to try to destroy the enemy anywhere and everywhere, there is no possibility that the war in Korea can be won. Under these latter circumstances we can only look forward to a series of holding actions and further withdrawals, as a result of which more blood will be shed, more needlessly in a futile effort to accomplish the impossible.

A humorist is often the best qualified to define an impending tragedy. Bugs Baer certainly told us what was up when he said:

"We're starting a new year. Don't let the other guy finish it."

POSSESSION OF ATOMIC WEAPONS BY RUSSIA—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN SENATOR McMAHON AND KARL T. COMPTON

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD correspondence between Karl T. Compton and myself regarding the possession by Russia of atomic weapons.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 14, 1950.

Dr. KARL T. COMPTON,
Chairman of the Board, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR DOCTOR COMPTON: I understand a recent newspaper story quotes you as denying a statement made on the floor of the Senate and to the effect that you have grave doubts of Russian possession of atomic weapons.

To clear the matter up, I'd certainly be grateful for any letter which you may care to write me on the subject.

Sincerely yours,

BRIEN MCMAHON,
Chairman.

MASSACHUSETTS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY,
December 21, 1950.

Senator BRIEN MCMAHON,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCMAHON: This is in reply to your letter of December 14 regarding a newspaper story about my alleged grave doubts as to Russian possession of atomic weapons.

I may have made some such statement shortly after the war and perhaps in connection with some testimony before a congressional committee. In that period I certainly did not believe that Russia had yet achieved an atomic bomb. However, I have no recollection as to whether I said it at all, and, if so, where.

I certainly have made no such statement since the time when the President announced an atomic explosion in Russia. This announcement was based on evidence too definite to be disregarded.

In summary, therefore, I can only say that if I have made such a statement it was made quite a bit earlier, and any implication that such a statement applies at the present time is improper and incorrect.

Very sincerely yours,

KARL T. COMPTON,
Chairman.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS BY GOV. THOMAS E. DEWEY, OF NEW YORK

CONSTRUCTIVE CRITICISM OF FOREIGN POLICY IS ESSENTIAL TO THE SAFETY OF THE NATION

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further requests for insertions in the RECORD or for submission of other routine matters, the Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wish to thank the majority leader for his action in opening the floor of the Senate for debate before the President's State of the Union message. In view of the crisis in which we find ourselves today, the President may well take longer for the preparation of his message, but certainly that should not prevent discussion of vital national issues on the floor of the Senate.

During recent years a theory has developed that there shall be no criticism of the foreign policy of the administration, that any such criticism is an attack on the unity of the Nation, that it gives aid and comfort to the enemy, and that it sabotages any idea of a bipartisan foreign policy for the national benefit. I venture to state that this proposition is a fallacy and a very dangerous fallacy threatening the very existence of the Nation.

In very recent days we have heard appeals for unity from the administration and from its supporters. I suggest that these appeals are an attempt to cover up the past faults and failures of the administration and enable it to maintain the secrecy which has largely enveloped our foreign policy since the days of Franklin D. Roosevelt. It was a distinguished Democrat, President Woodrow Wilson, who denounced secret diplomacy and demanded open covenant openly arrived at. The administrations of President Roosevelt and President Truman have repudiated that wise democratic doctrine and assumed complete authority to make in secret the most vital decisions and commit this country to the most important and dangerous obligations. As I see it, Members of Congress, and particularly Members of the Senate, have a constitutional obligation to reexamine constantly and discuss the foreign policy of the United States. If we permit appeals to unity to bring an end to that criticism, we endanger not only the constitutional liberties of the country, but even its future existence.

I may say that I hope the debate will occur on the floor of the Senate. I was invited to speak over the radio tonight following the speeches by former President Hoover and Mr. Dulles, and I declined because I felt that a statement of foreign policy by a Senator ought to be made on the floor of the Senate. I think there ought to be a continuous discussion of that policy during this session of the Senate.

Certainly when policies have been determined, unity in execution is highly desirable, and in the preparation for and the conduct of war it is essential. During recent months, the Republican minority has joined in granting to the President those powers which may be necessary to deal with the situation. We have not hesitated to pass a draft law, a law granting extensive powers of economic control, and almost unlimited appropriations for the Armed Forces. No action of the minority can be pointed to as in any way blocking or delaying the mobilization of our resources and our Armed Forces. If there has been any delay in the rearming, it has been in the administrative branch of the Government.

But it is part of our American system that basic elements of foreign policy shall be openly debated. It is said that such debate and the differences that may occur give aid and comfort to our possible enemies. I think that the value of such aid and comfort is grossly exaggerated. The only thing that can give real aid and comfort to the enemy is the adoption of a policy which plays into their hands as has our policy in the Far East. Such aid and comfort can only be prevented by frank criticism before such a policy is adopted.

Whatever the value of unity, it is also true that unity carried to unreasonable extremes can destroy a country. The Kaiser achieved unity in Germany. Hitler again achieved the same unity at the cost of freedom many years later. Mussolini achieved unity in Italy. The leaders of Japan through a method of so-called thought control achieved unity in Japan. In every case, policies adopted by these enforcers of unity led to the destruction of their own country. We have regarded ourselves as safe and a probable victor in every war. Today it is just as easy for us to adopt a false foreign policy leading to the destruction of our people as for any other nation to do so. The best safeguard against fatal error lies in continuous criticism and discussion to bring out the truth and develop the best program.

I have referred to the general tendency toward secrecy on the part of recent administrations. At Tehran and Yalta we secretly agreed to a zone of influence for Soviet Russia in Europe extending through the Baltic states and the Balkans and into the eastern zones of Austria and Germany. The result was to establish Russia in a position of power in central Europe which today threatens the liberty of Western Europe and of the United States itself. Our leaders secretly agreed to turn over control of Manchuria to Russia, and later hampered the operations of the Nationalist Government in combat against the Communists without consultation of any kind with Congress. In Germany our leaders adopted the Morgenthau plan while constantly denying that they were doing anything of the kind, and without submitting the questions in any way to Congress for discussion. The President without authority, as I pointed out in my speech on June 28, 1950, committed American troops to Korea without any consultation whatever with Congress and, in my opinion, without authority of law. He did not even tell Congress there was a war for 2 weeks after we were engaged. The President claims the right without consultation with Congress to decide whether or not we should use the atomic bomb.

We see now the beginning of an agreement to send a specified number of American troops to Europe without that question ever having been discussed in the Congress of the United States. The Atlantic Pact may have committed us to send arms to the other members of the pact, but no one ever maintained that it committed us to send many American troops to Europe. A new policy is being formulated without consulting the Congress or the people.

In other cases policies have been developed to a point where the honor of this country is committed before any serious debate by the public is permitted. Thus in the case of the Marshall plan and the Atlantic Pact, the programs were broached in the most general terms, then substantially advanced by the State Department through secret briefing conferences with many friendly groups and thorough indoctrination of friendly editors, columnists and commentators before they were submitted to the public or to Congress. After that if anyone dared to suggest criticisms or even a thorough debate, he was at once branded as an isolationist and a saboteur of unity and the bipartisan foreign policy.

More and more it has become customary to make agreements instead of treaties thus bypassing the power intended to be conferred on the Senate to pass on the wisdom of important principles of foreign policy. It is still fashionable to meet any criticism by cries of isolationism just as Mr. Hoover's recent speech has been treated. Criticisms are met by the calling of names rather than by intelligent debate.

I do not intend to say that a bipartisan foreign policy could not be adopted, but there has been no real bipartisan policy, at any rate since the 1948 election. It is a proper ideal and the minority will always be ready to answer any appeal for advice and cooperation. Only there cannot be a bipartisan foreign policy unless it is a policy on which both parties agree, and it is unlikely that there can be such agreement unless the administration is more inclined to give consideration to the views of the minority and to modify its own views than it has done in recent months. We certainly would be prepared to make concessions, but certainly the policy of concessions should not be a one-way street. I quite realize the difficulty of any President in consulting the minority in advance on every question of foreign policy, and I do not blame him for his failure to urge or adopt a bipartisan policy. But certainly the Republican minority cannot be attacked for failure to agree on policies on which they have not even been consulted or on policies which they may regard as detrimental to the welfare of the Nation.

The result of a general practice of secrecy in all the initial steps of foreign policy has been to deprive the Senate and Congress of the substance of the powers conferred on them by the Constitution.

We would be lacking in the fulfillment of our obligations and false to our oaths if we did not criticize policies which may lead to unnecessary war, policies which may wreck the internal economy of this country and vastly weaken our economic abilities through unsound taxation or inflation, policies which may commit us to obligations we are utterly unable to perform, and thus discredit us in the eyes of the world. Criticism and debate are essential if we are to maintain the constitutional liberties of this country and its democratic heritage. Under the present administration, at any rate, criticism and debate I think are essential to avoid danger and possible destruction of our Nation.

LIBERTY AND PEACE OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE SHOULD BE THE BASIC AIMS OF OUR FOREIGN POLICY

The principal purpose of the foreign policy of the United States is to maintain the liberty of our people. Its purpose is not to reform the entire world or spread sweetness and light and economic prosperity to peoples who have lived and worked out their own salvation for centuries, according to their customs, and to the best of their ability. We do have an interest, of course, in the economic welfare of other nations and in the military strength of other nations, but only to the extent to which our assistance may reduce the probability of an attack on the freedom of our own people.

After liberty, peace must be the goal of our policy and of our leaders—more than it has been in recent years. In order to assure progress and happiness for our people, we must avoid war like poison, except when it is absolutely essential to protect our liberty. War not only produces pitiful human suffering and utter destruction of things worth while, but it actually may end our own liberty, certainly for the time being. From our experience in the last two world wars, it actually promotes dictatorship and totalitarian government throughout the world. It is almost as disastrous for the victor as for the vanquished. War is to be preferred only to the destruction of our liberty.

It seems to me most unwise ever to admit that war is inevitable until it has occurred, and it seems to me that today our policy and the thinking of too many Americans are based too much on the premise that war is inevitable. It is a possibility which we must face, and for which we must prepare, but the theory of a preventive war, so closely related to the acceptance of that thesis, is contrary to every American principle and every moral principle.

THE MENACE OF COMMUNISM

The present situation arises out of the menace of communism and the military strength of Soviet Russia. Soviet Russia has broken every treaty. It has suppressed liberty everywhere within its zone of influence. It engineered a forcible seizure of the Government in Czechoslovakia. It promoted the military aggression of the North Koreans. It promoted the military aggression of the Chinese Communists. Those diplomats and soldiers who have had to deal with the Russians find them always unreasonable, uncompromising, and truculent. There is sufficient evidence of a determined plan to communize the entire world, which can be clearly envisioned from the writings of Lenin and Stalin, just as Hitler's intention could be found in Mein Kampf. Such a plan is evidenced by the formation of Communist organizations throughout the entire world, acting as agents for the Russian Government, and promoting the communizing of every country by propaganda and infiltration into labor unions, organizations of all kinds, and the government itself. We have seen how successful that effort has been in this country.

Does this Russian plan include a military conquest of the world, where infiltration is unsuccessful? It is now clear that it does include the use of satellite troops to attack neighboring countries in cases where such military aggression may not necessarily lead to a third world war. Up to this time, apparently, the Russians have not been willing to use their own armies in deliberate military aggression, for fear of precipitating such a war, but it is pointed out that that may be because they are not yet ready.

I myself do not see any conclusive evidence that they expect to start a war with the United States. Certainly I see no reason for a general panic on the assumption that they will do so. We have clearly notified them that any attack in Europe upon the members of the Atlantic Pact means a third world war, and we are obligated to enter such a war under the terms of the Atlantic Pact. Look at it from any point of view—and, I think, particularly from the Russian point of view—and it is difficult to see how the Russians today could reasonably entertain the hope that they can conquer the world by military action. It must seem to their thinkers an extremely difficult undertaking. I believe they are still thinking in terms of a slow but steady advance by the methods which they have used up to this time. Those methods are dangerous enough.

Since there is a greater possibility, however, of a destructive war against our liberty than we have ever faced in the past, at least since the Revolutionary War, there is no doubt that we should go just as far toward preparing for war as we can go in time of peace without weakening ourselves in the long run and destroying forever the very liberty which war is designed to protect.

The questions which our Government must decide and in which decisions the Congress and the people should have a determined and decisive voice are:

First. How far can we rely on the United Nations to maintain and restore peace?

Second. What should be our military policy in preparation for a possible attack by Russia on ourselves and our allies?

Third. Is such a policy possible for a long period of years without inflation and the loss of all liberty at home?

Fourth. How shall we convince the people of the world that liberty is a better way of life than communism can ever be?

How can we best maintain peace? The United Nations was established as the great organization to maintain peace. It has failed to do so because of fundamental defects in the Charter, defects which I have frequently pointed out. Certainly I would not advocate a withdrawal from the United Nations at this time. It does give a forum in which matters of differences can be discussed and brought out in the open. If we know what those differences are, there is some better chance for adjusting them than if grievances are built up under the surface and break out suddenly in unforeseen conflict. I supported the Charter when it was first adopted, largely on the ground that it would provide such a forum for discussion. When the Charter was before the Senate, I said:

I believe that an international organization, devoted to the maintenance of peace, to the study of possible threats to peace, and to a constant effort to solve the differences which lead to war, is an essential feature of any peace hope or peace policy. The United Nations Charter has many faults, some of which I shall discuss, but it provides without question a continuing council table at which are represented all the nations of the world, meeting constantly to solve those problems which in their opinion may endanger international peace. If the men who participate in this continuing conference are men of ability and good faith, I believe that this organization can go far toward preventing war.

But in the present crisis, where the entire world is threatened by the Communist menace, the United Nations has proved that it is not only an utterly ineffective weapon to check military aggression, but that it is actually a trap for those nations which rely upon it as an organization to secure action against aggressors.

But the defect of the United Nations lies in the fact that it was never based on law and justice to be interpreted by an impartial tribunal, but was based on a control of the world by the power of five great nations. Those who wrote the first draft of the Charter at Dumbarton Oaks did not even mention the word "justice"; and in the Charter as finally drafted, the Security Council, in deciding on means to preserve the peace, is guided solely by considerations of policy, not of justice. Obviously in such an organization, there must be a veto power; and that veto power nullifies any effective action by the United Nations. I pointed out in the debate on the Charter that the veto power changed the whole nature of the organization and reduced the United Nations organization to a consulting body. I said at that time:

All the discussion about force is of minor importance because it can never be used to solve any major crisis. * * * If the Charter had been in effect, Japan would have vetoed any action against itself on the invasion of Manchuria and of China. Italy would have vetoed any action against itself on the invasion of Ethiopia. In some ways the organization would have been less effective even than the League of Nations. The Charter could not use force if Russia were to invade Poland or seize the Dardanelles from Turkey. * * * Even attacks by satellite nations of one of the great powers might be engaged in safely if a great power had agreed in advance to exercise the veto power.

That is the end of the quotation from my speech at that time.

This prediction is borne out today by the Russian use of the veto power to prevent action against Communist China. I then said:

If one of the five great powers violates the Charter and vetoes action against its own violation, the Charter is for all practical purposes dissolved in failure.

When the North Koreans attacked it happened that Russia was boycotting the Security Council, and the resolution calling for action against the North Korean aggression was therefore passed without dissent.

On June 28, 1950, I questioned the legality of the United Nations action, because article 27 of the Charter clearly provides that decisions of the Security Council on all matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members. There was no concurring vote by Russia, but we overrode this objection without considering how it might be raised against us in the future. Furthermore, we took this action without considering the fact that, if the Chinese Communists attacked and the Russian representative returned to the Security Council, the United Nations could not follow up its action against the Korean Communists by similar action against Chinese Communists. If the Russians had planned it that way, they could not have done better. Did they perhaps arrange the North Korean attack when they were boycotting the United Nations, so that the United Nations might take an abortive action? Did they deliberately ignore the point I have just made relating to affirmative votes, knowing that they could later block action against China? We were sucked into the Korean War, as a representative of the United Nations, by a delusion as to a power which never has existed under the Charter.

We have vainly tried to bypass the limitations on the power of the Security Council by asking for action by the General Assembly. Under the Charter, this body was never intended to have any power to call on governments for action, or do more than recommend. It would be most unwise for us to build up any such power in the General Assembly. No nation has contracted to abide by any decision of the General Assembly. There is no obligation to comply with its recommendations. Furthermore, we would only have one vote among 60, which sometime in the future, even in the very near future, may be inconvenient for us. Certainly this does not excuse the failure of the Assembly to denounce the Chinese Communists as aggressors. Their failure repudiates the very basic theory of the Charter. But action taken by them today would have only moral effect.

Those who are blaming the United Nations should much more blame the limitations of the Charter and our own Government for forcing United Nations action beyond its permanent power to perform.

May I point out again, also, that the President incorrectly assumed that the United Nations was an operating organization, with power to call on us for troops which we could supply. As a matter of fact, he had no authority whatever to commit American troops to Korea without consulting Congress and without congressional approval. He could not commit our Armed Forces to support the United Nations under the very terms and provisions of the act which was passed by Congress to implement the United Nations Charter, for that act only recognized the commitment of troops in the event of the negotiation of a special military agreement with the Security Council "which shall be subject to the approval of the Congress by an appropriate act or joint resolution." The Russians have prevented the conclusion of any such agreement. Congress has therefore never acted. The President simply usurped authority, in violation of the laws and the Constitution, when he sent troops to Korea to carry out the resolution of the United Nations in an undeclared war. It may now be argued, of course, that Congress by appropriating money for additional Korean action has ratified the act, but the war was on, and we had no choice but to back up wholeheartedly the boys who were fighting in Korea. The calamity into which we have been drawn, and which has resulted in almost as many American casualties as the First World War, arose out of the unwarranted assumption that the United Nations was an operating organization, as we would have liked to see it, when as a matter of fact it was a hopeless weapon against aggression from the beginning.

I have suggested that we ought to formulate the amendments which would create an ideal organization, insist upon a full discussion of those amendments, and, if they are finally blocked by Soviet Russia, bring about the dissolution of the United Nations and the formation of a new organization which could be an effective weapon for peace. But for the present we can only make use of the United Nations as best we may, as a diplomatic weapon, and through it we may hope perhaps that more friendly relations can be established with Russia. But as far as military policy is concerned, I see no choice except to disregard the United Nations and to develop our own military policy and our own policy of alliances without regard to the nonexistent power of the United Nations to prevent aggression.

What then should be our military policy in preparation for a possible attack by Russia on ourselves or on our allies? Our first consideration must be the defense of America. Whatever one may feel about the action of the United States in other parts of the world, no matter how much of an internationalist a man may be, he must recognize that this country is the citadel of the free world. The defense of the United States itself is, of course, the first goal of our own people, essential to protect our liberty; but it is just as important to the rest of the world that this country be not destroyed, for its destruction would mean an end to liberty everywhere and to the hope of restoring liberty where it has been lost. It seems obvious that the immediate problem of defending this country depends upon control of the sea and control of the air.

There is no question that we have the largest Navy in the world, and certainly, while the British are our allies, complete control of the sea throughout the world, except as it may be hampered by Russian submarines. We have a powerful Air Force, but it seems to me vitally necessary that that Air Force be increased until we have control of the air over this country and over the oceans which surround our continent. It should be capable of expansion in time of war to secure as great control as possible over the rest of the world and over the enemy country. With our resources and with Great Britain as an ally, that is not impossible. By the end of the last war, we had practically complete control of the air over Germany and Japan, and it was the decisive factor in the winning of the war. Not only is the Air Force necessary for defense of America, but it is the one weapon which can damage the enemy bases from which air attacks upon us can be made, and which can drop atom bombs where they may be decisive.

Whether war can be ended by air power alone may be open to question, but certainly sea and air power can achieve a complete protection while other forces are being developed to meet whatever goals may seem to be desirable in a third world war. Of course, an army of reasonable size has a place in the defense of the American Continent. A land army is also necessary for the defense of air bases, further defense of islands near the continental shores, and for such occasional extensions of action into Europe or Asia as promise success in selected areas. But it need not be anything like as large an army as would be necessary for a land war on the continent of Europe or the continent of Asia.

The fact that the Air Force has deteriorated is due solely to the shortsightedness of this administration and the Pentagon policy which in substance refused any increase in Air Force unless corresponding increases occurred in the Army and Navy. The Eightieth Congress in 1947 set up a congressional Aviation Policy Board. This Board reported to the Congress on March 4, 1948, recommending a 70-group Air Force as a prerequisite for national security. A Citizens Advisory Commission set up by the President under Mr. Finletter also recommended a 70-group Air Force. The Eightieth Congress in the supplemental defense appropriation bill of 1948 provided for such a force and the Air Force increased from 55 groups in June 1948 to 59 groups in December 1948. On December 31, 1948, however, a Presidential directive required the Air Force to be cut to 48 groups. In 1949 the Eighty-first Congress provided for a build-up of the Air Force to 58 groups again, 10 more than recommended by the President, but the President when he signed the fiscal 1950 Military Appropriation Act directed the Secretary of Defense to place in reserve the amounts provided by the Congress for increasing the structure of the Air Force. The amount impounded by direction of the President totaled $775,450,000.

On October 5, 1949, I wrote:

> The possession of the bomb by Russia emphasizes above everything else the necessity of building up an all-powerful air force. The only possible defense is a complete control of the air. If there is ever a third world war, it will be won by the nation who can most completely dominate the air. We should build up our own Air Force again to 70 groups. We must constantly improve our Air Force and our air defense.

But until the Korean War, the President still insisted on holding the Air Force to 48 groups. Now the increase is to be balanced by an even larger increase in the land forces.

Not only is an all-powerful air force the best possible defense for the United States, but it is also the greatest deterrent to war. Winston Churchill has said that the American possession of the atomic bomb and the possibility of using it in an attack on Russia is the greatest possible deterrent to Russian aggression. It seems to me this must be true. The Russians are not going to be deterred by land armies until they are built up to a point threatening aggression against Russia or its satellites, and they can always attack before that point is reached. They know that the destruction of their principal industrial developments by atomic bombs may make it infinitely more difficult for them to succeed in any war. Every consideration, therefore, of American defense, and also of the insurance of peace, depends upon the development of an air force more efficient and more effective than the world has ever seen.

A superiority in air and sea forces throughout the world can achieve other purposes than mere defense. It can furnish effective assistance to all those nations which desire to maintain their freedom on the continent. It can achieve a balance of power under which more peaceful relations throughout the world can constantly be developed.

While defense of this country is our first consideration, I do not agree with those who think we can completely abandon the rest of the world and rely solely upon the defense of this continent. In fact, the very thesis of an effective control of sea and air by the free nations requires that we do interest ourselves in Europe and the Near East and India and the Far East, so that Communist influence may not extend to areas from which it is still possible to exclude it by many methods other than land armies. Of course, Mr. Hoover's recent speech was completely misrepresented by the administration press in this regard. He did not advocate retirement to the American continent. He only urged that emphasis be placed on our defense of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, as it should be, particularly if all of our allies should abandon us.

It seems to me that our battle against communism is in fact a world-wide battle and must be fought on the world stage. What I object to is undertaking to fight that battle primarily on the vast land areas of the continent of Europe or the continent of Asia where we are at the greatest possible disadvantage in a war with Russia. The first principle of military strategy is not to fight on the enemy's chosen battleground where he has his greatest strength. We could not have a better lesson than has been taught us in Korea. We cannot possibly transport enough men and equipment to overcome the vast manpower supplied by the teeming millions of Russia and of China. Where there is complete disregard for human life, even the best weapons and equipment will fail to overcome that disadvantage in manpower.

Our position is not greatly unlike that of Great Britain, which dominated much of the world for a period of 200 years, and brought about the balanced peace of the last half of the nineteenth century. The British had control of the seas and met every challenge to that control. There was no question of air power. They seldom committed any considerable number of British land troops to continental warfare, and when they did so they were by no means successful. Marlborough fought very largely with mercenary troops and the troops of his allies. Napoleon was finally defeated by a combination of many nations which did not contain more than 20 percent of British troops. Yet, control of the seas enabled the British in many places to develop power on the land, as in India. They supported one group in such countries against others, and gave strong support to their friends. They established garrisons at strategic points where sea power could protect them. It was the sea power of Britain which gave Britain a powerful influence on the Continent of Europe itself. It seems to me that by reasonable alliance with Britain, France, Holland, Australia, and Canada the control of sea and air can establish a power which never can be challenged by Russia and which can protect Europe as it has been protected now for 5 years through fear of what sea and air power can accomplish against Russia. There is no need for a specific line of defense, but we can exercise a power for peace over a vast area. If the Russians realize that that power cannot be challenged, and can do real damage to their own nation with the atomic bomb and otherwise, their purpose of military aggression may well wither, and gradually peaceful relations in Europe may grow again. The desire of human beings for peace and comfort and normal human relations is a powerful force which will constantly reassert itself.

I do not believe that this sea and air power should be used for aggressive purposes, but I do believe it should be available to assist those nations which ask for assistance to defend themselves against Communist aggression, to the extent that such power can be successfully and effectively used. We must not undertake anything beyond our power, as we have in Korea. We must not assume obligations by treaty or otherwise which require any extensive use of American land forces. In the first place, we should be willing to assist with sea and air forces any island nations which desire our help. Among those islands are Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, Indonesia, Australia, and New Zealand; on the Atlantic side, Great Britain, of course.

Japan is a special case. It seems to me we should at once make a treaty with Japan and then declare peace with Japan by joint resolution. Such a treaty should provide for assistance from the United States in the air and on the sea, with proper bases, and temporarily perhaps with a few divisions on land until the Japanese can create their own land army for defensive purposes.

I believe the policy would also involve the support of Chiang Kai-shek on Formosa and the providing of arms and other assistance which might enable him to defend himself and contest with the Chinese Communists in China itself at least until peace is made with them. It is ridiculous to talk about avoiding a war with Communist China when such a war already exists. When American boys are being killed by Chinese armies, and Peiping announces that they are fighting the United States and trying to destroy American forces, we might as well have a declared war. It would untie the hands of our military commanders, and force the return of some of their army to China. The operations of Chiang's army and the free Chinese on the mainland should be a real hindrance to the occupation of southeast Asia by Communist armies. In fact, it would seem to be the only hope. Such a war certainly need not involve the invasion of China by American armies, or cost us one more man, or one more dollar, than the present war in Korea. In fact, it would cost us much less.

I do not know enough about the military situation to know whether we can maintain our position in Korea, but certainly we should not jeopardize our Army there to the extent of risking its destruction. It is far better to fall back to a defensible position in Japan and Formosa than to maintain a Korean position which would surely be indefensible in any third world war.

There may be some question as to the ability of a sea and air power to defend islands in reasonably close proximity to the coast as are Formosa and Japan. Sea power there is seriously limited by submarines and mines, but we should make every possible effort to establish the ability of our Navy and Air Force to prevent any landing across 100 miles of salt water.

The power of great sea and air forces is not necessarily limited to island nations. The policy I suggest certainly would not abandon to Communist conquest the continental nations. In the first place, we may give economic assistance to many such nations providing they really want that assistance. We can give arms as we are bound to do under the Atlantic Pact, and as we are now doing in Indochina, in Greece, and in Turkey.

There are some places where it may even be wise to commit some land troops if we can see a reasonable chance of success. Korea does not seem to be such an area, but the entire continent of Africa is connected with Asia, and certainly we should assist in defending the Suez Canal as a means of maintaining our connections by sea, and northern Africa where we hold valuable air bases. It may be possible to assist Spain. I should suppose that Singapore and the Malay peninsula could be defended by land troops if sea and air power is available on both sides of the peninsula. The extension of such aid by land troops, however, is a dangerous experiment as we found in Korea. I doubt if we should enter into any commitments in advance, or undertake the job at all unless we are sure it is well within our capacity, and almost certain of success.

The greatest question of policy before the country and before this Congress, however, relates to our undertakings in Europe. Under the general principles I have laid down, I would say that we had better commit no American troops to the European continent at this time. Some modification is required in that theory because, first, we are now occupying Germany with the obligations growing out of the Second World War, and second we have made certain promises under the Atlantic Pact, which we are bound to carry out.

It might be well first to consider just what our obligations are under the Atlantic Pact. One thing seems certain. There is no legal obligation to send American land soldiers to Europe.

Article 5 of the treaty reads:

> The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

By its terms this article clearly leaves us free to determine what action we deem necessary. In other words, we are obligated to go to war with Russia if it attacks any of the Atlantic Pact nations, but we certainly are free to determine how we shall fight that war. A council is set up by article 9 which is to recommend measures for the implementation of article 5, but we are certainly not bound to accept any such recommendations.

In July 1949, on the floor of the Senate, it was even argued that the pact did not obligate us to provide arms and equipment for the parties to the pact. It seemed to me, however, that if we ratified the pact we were morally obligated to provide such equipment—and that is why I voted against it—in view of the promises made by the State Department in connection with the signing of the pact. The amount of this equipment, however, was not to be extensive and certainly it was based on a very large contribution by the other parties to their defense. On the bill implementing the pact the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] said:

> So I am sure the Senator from Maryland agrees that, in the final analysis, the great strength and authority of the North Atlantic Pact is, not in article 3, but in article 5, which is a general notification to any potential aggressor that if he does aggress upon the North Atlantic community, he will confront all the resources of 300,000,000 people to guarantee his defeat.
> Mr. TYDINGS. I agree thoroughly with the able and distinguished Senator from Michigan.

The Senator from Michigan severely limited even our contributions for arms. He explained in the debate on the bill implementing the pact that the over-all assistance was only $1,100,000,000, to be paid out at the rate of $500,000,000 a year. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] made it clear that the pact did not obligate us to send a land army to Europe. He said:

> This bill does not provide, as has been said by some persons, that we are rearming Western Europe. Western Europe will spend $5 or $6 for each dollar contributed by the United States. Let me point out that we are not increasing by this aid the number of armed men in the armies of the North Atlantic Pact nations. We are simply undertaking to modernize their existing armies which they themselves raise by aiding them in obtaining equipment, munitions, and supplies. But we are not sending a single soldier to any of those countries for combat purposes, nor are we insisting that they increase the size of their armed forces.

So it can be seen that what is being talked about today is something entirely different from what was being considered when we adopted the Atlantic Pact.

In his appearances before the Foreign Relations Committee, Secretary Acheson denied that we were obligated to send troops or even extensive aid in equipment. He said:

> It is not proposed to increase the establishments beyond what is already provided in their budgets.

Now we are urging that they triple and quadruple their budgets. I quote further:

> This assistance has to do with the provision of more effective and better rounded equipment for those forces. The European nations will do the great bulk of this equipping themselves. They will enter into—in fact they already have devised the basis of—agreements by which they will help one another get equipment.
> So far as the pact countries are concerned, United States assistance will be somewhere between one-sixth and one-seventh of the total effort which will go into military efforts in Europe. We will provide, as is stated in the statement, approximately $1,130,000,000 for the pact countries.

Now we are talking about providing, in addition, 25 percent of all the foot soldiers involved in the European defense army.

In committee Secretary Acheson was asked the direct question by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER]:

> I believe you said earlier in your testimony today that it was contemplated that a great portion of the armament, or the developed armament, of Western Europe, in the nations of this pact, would be carried under their own weight. I presume that that refers also to the manpower in their armies. I am interested in getting the answers as to whether or not we are expected to supply substantial numbers—by that, I do not mean a thousand or two, or 500, or anything of that kind, but very substantial numbers—of troops and troop organizations, of American troops, to implement the land power of Western Europe prior to aggression.
> Is that contemplated under article 3, where we agree to maintain and develop the collective capacity to resist? In other words, are we going to be expected to send substantial numbers of troops over there as a more or less permanent contribution to the development of these countries' capacity to resist?
> Secretary ACHESON. The answer to that question, Senator, is a clear and absolute "No."

Since the sponsors of the treaty backed by the State Department took this position, they can hardly contend now that we have any obligation under the Atlantic Pact to send American soldiers to Europe. We did have warning at the time of the Atlantic Pact that the military authorities in the Pentagon regarded the pact as leading toward a land war with Russia and American troops in Europe. I pointed out in opposing the pact that we were headed in this direction. I said:

> It is one thing to agree to go to war with Russia if it attacks Western Europe. It is another to send American ground troops to defend Norway or Denmark or Holland or Italy, or even France and England. I cannot assert positively that we are committing ourselves to a particular type of war, but I am inclined to think that we are. Thus General Bradley testified before the committee:
> "Finally, after studied appraisal of the future security provisions for our country, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are in unanimous agreement that our strategy, in case we are attacked must rely on sufficient integrated forces of land, sea, and air power to carry the war back to the aggressor, ultimately subjugating the sources of his military and industrial power. Plans for the common defense of the existing free world must provide for the security of Western Europe without abandoning these countries to the terrors of another enemy occupation. Only upon that premise can nations closest to the frontiers be expected to stake their fortunes with ours in the common defense."

This appears to contemplate a land war with Russia on the continent of Europe. It appears to contemplate later an invasion along the lines which Napoleon and Hitler found to be impossible. It implies that the nations which signed this pact expect us to send American troops to defend their frontiers.

But it was only our military planners who discussed sending American land troops to Europe. Responsible officials of the Government absolutely repudiated any idea that the Atlantic Pact contemplated any such aid. If the President in his conference with Mr. Attlee, or Secretary Acheson at Brussels, has undertaken to commit the United States to any such assistance before or during a war they are usurping the authority given by law and their program should be submitted to Congress for consideration before we become obligated. The President has no power to agree to send American troops to fight in Europe in a war between the members of the Atlantic Pact and Soviet Russia. Without authority he involved us in the Korean War. Without authority he apparently is now attempting to adopt a similar policy in Europe. This matter must be debated and determined by Congress and by the people of this country if we are to maintain any of our constitutional freedoms. I note that, at his press conference yesterday, the President asserted that he had the right to send additional troops to Europe. Technically, of course, he can send troops to occupied Germany as long as the war status is in effect. But, in fact, no more troops are needed for the occupation of Germany. In fact those already there are a heavy burden on the German people. Also we hope that soon the war status may be ended by resolution. If the President has any technical right to send American troops to Europe, certainly Congress by resolution, such as the Coudert resolution, or by restriction in the appropriation bill providing the divisions required, may finally determine the policy to be pursued.

My own views on the general policy of the Atlantic Pact were clearly stated in a speech which I made on the Senate floor on July 11, 1949, in opposing the ratification of that treaty. It has now become an obligation of this country and the situation is therefore somewhat changed. We have two divisions in Germany. If Russia attacks, we will be in the war. We would be obligated to be in the war if Russia attacked any member of the Atlantic Pact. But I do not think we should force our assistance on nations which do not wish to arm themselves. I do not think we should insist or even urge that the European nations form a great international army unless they request us to help them in that project. I do not think we should assume the leadership in the formation of a great international army by the appointment of an American commander in chief. General Eisenhower is going to Europe to look into the wisdom of this project, and I hope he explores every aspect of such a commitment. If we do so, we will be called upon constantly to increase our contributions to this army, and it will be very embarrassing to decline, because we shall be the sponsor of the entire project. On the other hand, if these nations really do desire to build up their own arms, and do so with our assistance, which we are obligated to give, and if the time comes when they see the need of and demand a coordinated defense, and if it appears at that time that that defense has a reasonable chance of success, I should not object to committing some limited number of American divisions to work with them in the general spirit of the Atlantic Pact. Such a program, however, never ought to be a key point in our over-all military strategy. And the initiative should be theirs and not ours.

The course which we are pursuing will make war more likely. If this great international force which we envision is gradually built up, the Russians for a while will gradually increase their strength, but it seems obvious that if they think the Allies are gaining on them too rapidly, they can always begin the war. However defensive and pacific our intentions, to them the building up of this force must look like aggression when it is completed. Someone has invented the theory that the Russians have a particular timetable under which they were at one time looking to attack in 1955. Then the makers of timetables moved the time up to 1952, and now they have moved it up to 1951.

I know of no evidence for any such conclusion. If they have an intention to attack, they will obviously attack before the Atlantic Pact forces are built up, and it will take at least 3 years to build them up. Why should they wait? If they have no intention to attack, then we do not need the armed forces, at least in such coordinated form and in such close proximity to Russia as to seem to threaten an attack on them.

Furthermore, I am most concerned about the danger and difficulty of committing our greatest efforts to a great land war on the continent of Europe against Russia. Neither Napoleon nor Hitler was ever able finally to defeat Russia on land, although they had more men than we are now planning, certainly in comparison to the number of Russians then available. If we send to Europe or promise to send within a few weeks of the beginning of the war, say a million and a half men, there is at least a reasonable chance that that army may be destroyed and may never return to this country. They will certainly be outnumbered, as they are in Korea. Their defense against Russian hordes apparently depends on the development of new weapons which are still untested. Even then a modern war cannot be won by remaining on the defensive, even behind a Maginot line of bazookas.

Furthermore, do we not risk the loss of every man we send to Europe? If we have to spend $3,000,000,000 building air shelters in this country to protect our people and cities against Russian atom bombs, then surely there is danger that the Russians can destroy all of the ports of the Continent which we may be using. They may prevent the landing of our troops, and the furnishing of adequate supplies. They may make even a Dunkerque impossible. One atom bomb at Hungnam might have destroyed the entire American force which escaped from there. The entire facilities of escape, as well as the men themselves, might well have been destroyed by a single such bomb.

Is such a military policy possible for any period of years without inflation and the loss of liberty at home?

I believe that it is possible for us to maintain our economy if we pursue the air and sea strategy I have outlined. Apparently, 700,000 men apiece for the Navy and Air Force would provide a most powerful sea and air defense. I must admit I am guessing as to the figures because they have been presented most indefinitely to the Armed Services Committee, but it is at least suggested in the hearings that $10,000,000,000 a year would take care of the current operations of these two forces plus about $10,000,000,000 a year in new equipment. This equipment bill might decrease after several years when the forces reach their full strength. To this $20,000,000,000 must be added another $20,000,000,000 for the Army even if we hold that Army to approximately a million and a half men. The total expense of $40,000,000,000 a year for military purposes plus domestic expenditures and aid to foreign nations might hold the entire expenditures of the Federal Government within $65,000,000,000. It is possible, in my opinion, to develop taxes which will ultimately meet that bill.

However, those who are thinking of our policy in terms of an American Army in Europe and a war there with Russia propose a much larger increase in the Army. The program is entirely indefinite at this moment, but I have heard talk of having as many as 4,500,000 men under arms, which would mean a land army of 3,000,000 men. If we are going to try to put a million and a half or 2,000,000 men in Europe or available for transportation to Europe within a few weeks of Russian attack, this may not be unreasonable. But it would certainly increase the Armed Forces bill by another $20,000,000,000 to $30,000,000,000 a year. That money would have to be borrowed and we would be perpetually on a deficit basis. I do not believe it is possible to prevent inflation with an annual deficit of $20,000,000,000.

Even with the smaller bill, price and wage controls will probably be necessary and they may be effective to stabilize prices if we are balancing the budget and not creating inflation, but even controls cannot prevent inflation and decrease in the value of the dollar if we permit such a tremendous deficit through an increase in Army expense for any considerable number of years.

Furthermore, the larger the Army with very little to do, the more difficult it will be to maintain its morale. Before Pearl Harbor the morale of our Army was exceedingly low, with frequent desertions and a complete lack of understanding of the necessity for keeping numbers of boys in camp. Russia could desire nothing more than an indefinite condition of economic weakness and inflation, with millions of men taken out of productive work and the inevitable dissatisfaction which will result in turning the United States into a garrison state.

Incidentally, no matter what the program may be, there are certain principles which I think should be impressed on our Army officials. Is it necessary for this country to provide from sixty to seventy thousand men in uniform and half as many more civilians in order to put a division of 18,000 men in the field? Every day industry is creating improvements to increase the efficiency per man of the American population. Every day our inventors are saving manpower. Is not the Army wasting a vast amount of manpower in its operations? Does any other country use as many men to get war power into the front lines? Could we not provide twice as many divisions at the front with the same number of men? Every Senator hears daily, stories of the waste in Army procurement and in the methods by which that procurement is carried out. This whole problem has become of infinitely greater importance than it ever has been before, because we undoubtedly face a long period of heavy militarization such as we have never faced in the history of this country. It should be made the subject of intensive study by men who have had some experience in industrial operations.

Under any program, the American people are going to be called on for vast sacrifices. Nearly every boy of 19 is going to be drafted for 2 years' military service. Tremendous taxes will be imposed which will reduce the income and standard of living of every American citizen. Surely, they have the right to insist upon a program as economical as it can be made to accomplish the purposes on which I hope we may all agree.

The key to all the problems before this Congress lies in the size of our military budget. That determines the taxes to be levied. It determines the number of boys to be drafted. It is likely to determine whether we can maintain a reasonably free system and the value of our dollar, or whether we are to be weakened by inflation and choked by Government controls which inevitably tend to become more arbitrary and unreasonable.

How shall we convince the people of the world that liberty is a better way of life than communism can ever be?

Before the advent of communism the best method of showing the benefits of liberty was to set an example by our own policies. Under a free system we have brought about in this country the greatest production, the greatest productivity per person, and the highest standard of living the world has ever seen. Generally speaking, we have successfully maintained liberty and equality for the individual.

But communism has introduced a new spirit of aggression into the world. It has inspired fanatical zeal in its advocates. It has adopted a combination of deceit, propaganda, and strong-arm methods, which has spread its control over hundreds of millions of men and over many countries. Now we are forced to use the same methods which communism has adopted, even if we do not like those methods, or be swept away. I have outlined the military preparation which I think necessary. I have supported aid to foreign countries in order that they might more successfully combat the attacks of communism. But I also believe we should adopt aggressive methods of propaganda. We have something to sell. Liberty has always been a more appealing philosophy to the people of the world than totalitarian communism can ever be. We have to convince ourselves first that we really believe in the benefits of liberty, but if we do that we have all the arguments and all the results to point to. If we are sufficiently intelligent and understand the thinking of other people, we should be able to win the battle against communism in the minds of men, by setting up an organization to win the appeal against communism.

Finally, I believe we should use the same methods of infiltration as have the Russians. We need a much more effective intelligence force. We need to study the methods by which those millions who yearn for liberty in satellite countries may be organized to seize power wherever they have the support of their fellow citizens. We can back Chiang Kai-shek in his operations in China among the free Chinese and the underground. Today, so far as I can see, there is no central agency anywhere to organize the lovers of freedom throughout the world, and keep in communication with them and their programs; no over-all direction of the appeal against communism.

CONCLUSION

The threat of communism is real. Those who are directing its affairs are brilliant and unprincipled. America must be the leader in the battle to prevent the spread of communism and preserve the liberty of the world. In the field of military operations our strongest position is in the air and on the sea, and we should not attempt to be also a controlling power on the land. We should not be a military aggressor or give the impression of military aggression or incite a war which might otherwise never occur. Operations on the continents of Europe and Asia, if any, should be undertaken only with the greatest care and under careful limitation. We must not so extend ourselves as to threaten economic collapse or inflation, for a productive and free America is the last bastion of liberty.

And finally the policy we adopt must be approved by Congress and the people after full and free discussion. The commitment of a land army to Europe is a program never approved by Congress, into which we should not drift. The policy of secret executive agreements has brought us to danger and disaster. It threatens the liberties of our people.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'CONOR in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to be permitted to say first that the Senator from Ohio has made a characteristically able speech, and I join with him in the hope that this may be a preface to a thorough discussion of foreign policy. I believe the President has the constitutional power, as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, to send troops to the continent of Europe. I believe that under the Constitution, since the power of Congress being limited to a declaration of war, the President can take steps to resist aggression. I developed this point at length on July 5 of last year. But I think this issue is so important that it is necessary to clear the air and to have the various alternatives discussed, and I hope very much that the Senate and, if possible, the House of Representatives, may come to some clear conclusion. So while I agree with much that the Senator has said and disagree with a good deal also, I wish to say that I think he deserves to be congratulated for raising the issue and for pitching the debate on so high a level.

Having said that, I hope I may in good temper and in good spirit be permitted to ask the Senator a series of questions on what I believe to be the fundamental sequence of his arguments.

Am I correct in assuming that the Senator from Ohio is saying in effect that we should not commit ourselves to appreciable land forces in either Europe or Asia, but should instead hold island bases off those continents from which we can launch air attacks as a deterrent to land attacks by Russia and its satellites, and as a protection for those continents if such land attacks take place?

Mr. TAFT. I certainly would not contemplate air attacks unless we were involved in war some place. If we were at war, yes, I would say that such bases should be used where they are. We would not have a great many bases, I imagine.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then, the Senator would favor island bases for Asia and for Europe, from which, if a military movement by the Chinese Communists in Asia or by the German or Russian Communists in Europe took place, he would then have our Air Force take action?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, if we are at war. If Russia should attack any member of the Atlantic Pact, we would be at war, and I certainly would advocate air attacks upon Russia in that case. I suggest that we might just as well be at war with the Chinese Communists today. We read only yesterday an article by a well-informed columnist, in which he stated that the Communists are almost certain to attack Indochina tomorrow, or within a short period of time. If so, is it not better to be at war and try to have the Chinese Nationalist forces divert the Chinese Reds from the attempt to conquer Southeast Asia and possibly the islands beyond?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say, if an attack is launched against Western Europe, France, or the countries of Western Europe, by the German Communists or the Russian Communists or by some combination, that we should be obligated to help defend those countries?

Mr. TAFT. We would be obligated to declare war on Russia, as I see it. As to how such a war should be fought ought to be a question of strategy at that time. Once we are involved with Russia we are involved everywhere. It might be found that land forces would be required. I do not think we ought to commit ourselves to do that to a greater extent than I suggested.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that the Senator places his chief reliance upon deterrent or retaliatory bombing from island bases or from the continent of Europe? I have the text of his speech here, and that is the only inference we can draw from page 11.

Mr. TAFT. So far as our part in a war with Russia is concerned it would be largely conducted by sea and air.

Mr. DOUGLAS. According to the Senator's speech, that is true.

Mr. TAFT. There may be various ways in which that can be done. Bombing would probably be the most effective way. I would not bar the sending of troops to Europe if that should prove at the time to be a feasible project with some hope of success. My doubt about it is more as to the practicability of today building up an international army for Europe, since the Russians would be able to overwhelm it at any time during its 3 years of preparation whenever they decided it would be too much of a menace to them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio: Is it not true that Korea has pretty well demonstrated that an aggressive land army cannot be turned back by air power alone? There is no question that in Korea we have had complete dominance of the air thus far, but the Chinese Communists have broken our lines once and, as we debate, are apparently going to do so again?

Mr. TAFT. I think that is quite true. I do not think that bombing is going to stop an army. I opposed the President's suggestion of bombing the Chinese Communists, because I do not think it is true that an atom bomb is an effective tactical weapon against an army in the field. All that can be done is to weaken them by destroying their bases and communications and industrial potential. The Russian potential is not too great in any event, and we can hamper them so that other countries who are defending themselves can have a better chance of success.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does it not follow from the Senator's statement that, if continental Europe does not build up a sufficient army to check the Communists on the ground, our threat of bombing from the air will certainly not stop the Communist armies if they start to move in Europe?

Mr. TAFT. Once war is declared it will not stop the Communist armies, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And will not the Communist armies therefore sweep through completely to the English Channel?

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator think there would be any difference if we have 10 American divisions there?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is something else.

Mr. TAFT. It is not something else again. It is exactly the question the Senator is asking. I am saying that the commitment of American troops will not substantially change that situation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am pointing out that the Senator would depend upon island bases to keep the Communists off if they are going to be kept off; and I presume that the Senator is chiefly referring to the British Isles as air bases.

Mr. TAFT. There are other places; such as Africa, Turkey, and other areas of the world.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well. But if the Communists were to sweep through to the Atlantic Ocean, does the Senator suppose England could be kept as an air base from which we could operate? What about rocket bombs, guided missiles, and air attacks by the Russians themselves? How could we hold those bases? Would not we need air bases from which to launch aerial attacks?

Mr. TAFT. My suggestion to the Senator is—as he will observe if he will read my speech—that we do not have the power to control the air and the sea and also the land.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We will if we have under arms 3,000,000 men, as proposed by the Senator, that will not be sufficient. But a 6,000,000 force plus the rearmament of Europe would give us a much better chance.

Mr. TAFT. From the area I have indicated we could best operate against the Russians, if we were involved in war against them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Again I wish to point out that domination of the air does not stop a strong land attack.

Mr. TAFT. Of course not—it will not stop the attack.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If a land attack reached the English Channel, it would tend to cause the loss of the very bases upon which we would depend in connection with such aerial strength as we might develop.

Mr. TAFT. With all due respect to the Senator, let me point out that the question is a practical one. I should like to ask the Senator or anyone else, Why on earth should the Russians let us build up in Europe a vast army which would be a threat to them, when in the meantime the Russians are free to do whatever they wish to do?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it the Senator's contention that we should not arm at all, lest we offend the power which has superiority at the moment? That would keep us in a continued position of inferiority.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Atlantic Pact was a tremendous mistake. In my opinion, it could at least be interpreted as an aggressive move. It seems to me the Atlantic Pact and the present program, if carried out, create the greatest probability of war that could be created by any measure we could undertake.

The European nations themselves do not seem to feel that the Russians contemplate making an attack. As the European nations recover their strength, no doubt they will gradually build up their own military forces to a point where they will be effective. I suggest that at that time we could add further to what we may have done before that time.

I have not excluded the possibility of our giving them some assistance. I think the Atlantic Pact has involved us in a certain obligation which I do not desire to repudiate. However, we must consider the practical possibilities in this situation. We must consider the fact that this particular policy assumes, first, that the Russians want to attack Western Europe. If that assumption is correct, they are not going to wait until this great army is built up. Why should they wait? If they have decided to attack Europe, why should not they attack before the army is built up? It will take 3 or 4 years to build it up. If we do not want to face the possibility of Communist invasion the Senator has outlined, it can only be by assuming that the Russians are not desirous of attacking Western Europe. On that assumption, these countries can gradually develop their strength.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the Senator from Ohio does rely on that assumption and I submit it is a very dangerous one to make.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. As I understand the Senator's speech, he is opposed to a preventive war; and on that point I completely agree with him.

Furthermore, I understand that the Senator proposes complete reliance on our air and sea power. Is it not correct that if we stand idly by and allow the Russians to attack Western Europe and to reach the sea, as it may very well be the Russians have the power to do, they would immediately have both an industrial potential at least equal to our own; and a shipbuilding potential, in the event they took over England, as they undoubtedly would be able to do if they reached the Channel; and a potential in the building of planes, using the productive power of France, of Italy, of England, and possibly of Germany, at least equal to our own?

It would seem to me that we would be completely surrendering any possibility of protecting ourselves, even if we remained isolated in this country.

Mr. TAFT. In the first place, I wish to deny the premise that we stand idly by. We have not been doing any standing idly by. We have given billions of dollars' worth of economic aid in order that the countries of Western Europe can build up their industrial potential. We have given them billions of dollars, and are preparing to give billions of dollars more, for arms aid, to enable those countries to protect themselves. After all, there are 225,000,000 people in Western Europe—50 percent more than we have in the United States. We are helping them to defend themselves. They have more extra manpower than we have in the United States today.

I have only raised the question of whether we should commit an American land army to Europe.

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must request the occupants of the galleries to refrain from making any demonstration.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for another question?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair inform the occupants of the galleries that they are the guests of the Senate. If they insist on continuing such demonstration, I ask the Chair to direct that the galleries be vacated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will certainly do so, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Arizona, and must emphasize the fact that order must be maintained.

The Senator from Ohio may proceed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Continuing the question of the junior Senator from New York, is it not true that on a standard basis of measuring steel production, our capacity for producing steel, when taken at the lower figure, is approximately 97,000,000 tons a year; that of Soviet Russia and her satellites is approximately 35,000,000 tons a year; and that of Western Europe, when we consider its capacity, is approximately 62,000,000 tons a year. These figures are substantially correct. Therefore, so long as Western Europe is in combination with the United States, the free world can surpass Russia in the capacity for producing the most essential military and industrial element, and can do so at the rate of about 4 to 1. But if Western Europe should fall under Russian control, 35,000,000 tons plus 62,000,000 tons will equal the 97,000,000 tons which constitute our total capacity. In that event, on the basis of current steel-production capacity, the totalitarian world will be on terms of equality with ourselves?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to answer?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I was going to suggest that the distinguished Senator from Illinois is not giving attention to the air power which the Senator from Ohio has said will destroy those plants in Western Europe.

Mr. TAFT. I quite agree that we do not want the Russians to take over the productive capacity of Western Europe, either in steel or in anything else. However, where would the Senator have the line to be defended? The best information I have is that for us to try to defend the line of the Elbe is almost impossible, and that therefore we would have to defend the Rhine. That means that we would have to abandon the Ruhr to the Russians. They already have Silesia. What would we do about it if we stood on the Rhine? We could bomb Essen and the Ruhr to prevent the production of steel there; but we could do that without being on the Rhine; we could do that from England or from Africa or from other places besides France and the Rhineland.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it not a fact that our Air Force in the last war could have completely destroyed the Krupp Works and the other munitions works in Germany, had they been permitted to do so?

Mr. TAFT. As a matter of fact, they did destroy the Krupp Works, because I visited there after the war, and there was only one small building left in the corner of it. They were not destroyed as early as they might have been.

However, it seems clear to me that the entire question is one of practicability: If the Russians today have the determination to conquer Western Europe which the Senator assumes, why should not they do so tomorrow or the next day? Why should they wait until we provide a great many land troops? That is something I cannot understand.

Mr. LEHMAN and Mr. KNOWLAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TAFT. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I do not have any idea whether Russia is going to wait or is not going to wait; but it seems to me that the theory enunciated by the Senator from Ohio is an extremely dangerous one.

I would repeat the question which was propounded by the Senator from Illinois: If it be true that the initiative lies completely with Russia, then why should we take any steps or any means whatever to strengthen either our allies abroad or ourselves?

Mr. TAFT. Is it not evident that neither England nor France is eager for this tremendous international army? Is not that a perfectly obvious fact? Is it not evident that those countries do not think there is going to be a Russian attack on them? Is it not true today that the idea of a Russian attack is much less accepted there than it is in the United States?

Mr. LEHMAN. May I answer that question?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. LEHMAN. Is it not true that France, England, Belgium, Holland, and Luxemburg are confused when they hear speeches made by a former President of the United States, seeking to prohibit the shipment of a single dollar or a single man, until the Western European countries erect a sure dam against aggression?

Mr. TAFT. That is not my interpretation of the former President's speech.

Mr. LEHMAN. That is the statement. I have quoted it, I believe, substantially verbatim. What possible incentive have the people of the countries of Western Europe to defend themselves with all their power, when they know that there is a school of thought in this country—which I pray God will never prevail—that we should withhold all support from them, either material support or support in the way of human resources?

Mr. TAFT. Those countries are the ones who have held back, because, as I understand, our Government for more than a year has been pressing for an agreement of the kind that was contemplated in the Atlantic Pact, and they have dragged their feet. They have not been eager to enter into such an agreement. Ours is the country that has been trying to make them move. It seems to me this is their affair. The chief point of my speech was that, in any such program, they must take the initiative. They ought to take the initiative. If they do not feel so strongly about it, then there must be some good reason why they feel as they do; and it seems to me perfectly obvious that we have no business going over there and trying to draw a large number of people into a great military program which, in my opinion, is almost certain to produce war, if it actually develops in any large or effective way.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Apropos of the statement made by the Senator from Illinois and other Senators, questioning the effectiveness of air power, and citing as an example the situation in Korea, is it not correct, in the Senator's judgment, that the responsible commanders of the United Nations forces in Korea have had their hands tied, so that they could not make effective use of the air power in striking at the arsenals, the depots, and troop-concentration points from which the reinforcements and supplies are being poured into Korea from Manchuria? They have been operating under those conditions, with an arm tied behind the back. So the situation in Korea cannot be correctly interpreted as showing a lack of the effectiveness of air power, if properly used.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator is entirely correct. I may say I think it doubtful whether air power can stop the actual physical advance of an army across a front of 200 miles; but unquestionably it can weaken the whole background of such an army. It can weaken it; it can destroy the plants which make the weapons; it can stop all the communications. The Air Force was a very effective element against the North Koreans so long as we could bomb their connections with Communist China in Korea, but, of course, the fact that we are not in a war with Communist China—supposedly—has prevented the use of air power against Communist China.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wonder whether the Senator will permit, as part of his remarks in this colloquy, my placing in the RECORD the official report to the United Nations Security Council, made by Gen. Douglas MacArthur, on the 6th day of November 1950, in which he cites a long series of aggressions by the Chinese Communists, which started on the 22d of August, when antiaircraft batteries north of the Yalu River fired on the American planes which were flying south of the Yalu River in support of the United Nations resolution; going through to the 16th of October, when the first Communist aggressive forces from Red China were definitely identified in Korea; and down through the 4th of November, which was a day preceding the time he sent his report to the Security Council.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTE DATED NOVEMBER 6, 1950, FROM THE PERMANENT REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO THE SECRETARY-GENERAL TRANSMITTING A SPECIAL REPORT DATED NOVEMBER 5, 1950, FROM THE UNITED NATIONS COMMAND IN KOREA IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION OF JULY 7, 1950

The representative of the United States to the United Nations presents his compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and has the honor to refer to paragraph 6 of the resolution of the Security Council of July 7, 1950, requesting the United States to provide the Security Council with reports, as appropriate, on the course of action taken under the United Nations command.

In compliance with this resolution, there is enclosed herewith, for circulation to the members of the Security Council, a special report dated November 5, 1950, from the United Nations command operations in Korea.

Following is text of special report from commanding general United Nations command:

"I herewith submit a special report of the United Nations command operations in Korea which I believe should be brought to the attention of the United Nations."

INTRODUCTION

"The United Nations forces in Korea are continuing their drive to the north and their efforts to destroy further the effectiveness of the enemy as a fighting force are proving successful. However, presently in certain areas of Korea, the United Nations forces are meeting a new foe. It is apparent to our fighting forces, and our intelligence agencies have confirmed the fact, that the United Nations are presently in hostile contact with Chinese Communist military units deployed for action against the forces of the united command.

"The fact of intervention:

"Hereafter, in summary form, are confirmed intelligence reports substantiating the fact that forces other than Korean are resisting our efforts to carry out the resolutions of the United Nations:

"A. August 22: Approximately 50 bursts heavy antiaircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB–29 flying at 7,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of the Sui-Ho Reservoir; damage, none; time, 1600 K.; weather, 10 miles visibility, high broken clouds.

"B. August 24: Approximately 40 bursts heavy antiaircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB–29 flying at 10,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of Sinuiju; damage, none; time, 1500 K.; weather, 20 miles visibility.

"C. October 15: Antiaircraft fire from the Manchurian side of Yalu River against a flight of four F–51's flying near the Sinuiju airfield on the Korean side of the river; damage, one aircraft total loss; time, 1445 I.; weather, overcast at 8,000 feet; 8 to 10 miles visibility.

"D. October 16: The Three Hundred and Seventieth Regiment of the One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Division of the Chinese Communist Forty-second Army, consisting of approximately 2,500 troops, crossed the Yalu River (Korean border) at Wan Po Jin, and proceeded to the area of Chosen and Fusen Dams in North Korea where they came in contact with UN forces approximately 40 miles north of Hamhung.

"E. October 17: Approximately 15 bursts heavy antiaircraft fire from Manchurian side of Yalu River against RB–29 flying at 10,000 feet over Korea in the vicinity of Sinuiju; damage, none; time, 1200 I.; weather, 8 miles visibility, low clouds 2,300 feet.

"F. October 20: A Chinese Communist task force known as the Fifty-sixth unit consisting of approximately 5,000 troops crossed the Yalu River (Korean border) at Antung and deployed to positions in Korea south of the Sui-Ho Dam. A captured Chinese Communist soldier of this task force states that his group was organized out of the regular Chinese Communist Fortieth Army stationed at Antung, Manchuria.

"G. November 1: A flight of F–51's was attacked early in the afternoon by 6 to 9 jet aircraft which flew across the Yalu River into Manchuria. No damage was done to United States aircraft. A red star was observed on the top of the right wing on one of the jet aircraft.

"H. November 1: Antiaircraft fire from the Manchurian side of the Yalu River directed against a flight of 13 F–80 aircraft was observed in the vicinity of Sinuiju at 1345 hours. This resulted in the total loss of one United Nations aircraft.

"I. October 30: Interrogation of 19 Chinese prisoners of war identified two additional regiments of One Hundred and Twenty-fourth CCF Division and the Three Hundred and Seventy-first and the Three Hundred and Seventy-second in the vicinity of Changjin.

"J. November 2: Interrogation of prisoners of war indicates the Fifty-fourth CCF unit in Korea. This unit is reported to have same organization as Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth units, but to be drawn from the One Hundred and Twelfth, One Hundred and Thirteenth and One Hundred and Fourteenth Divisions of the Thirty-eighth CCF Army.

"K. November 3: Further interrogation of Chinese prisoners of war indicates Fifty-sixth CCF unit organized from elements of One Hundred and Eighteenth, One Hundred and Nineteenth and One Hundred and Twentieth CCF Divisions of the Fortieth CCF Army.

"L. November 4: As of this date, a total of 35 CCF prisoners had been taken in Korea.

"The continued employment of Chinese Communist forces in Korea and the hostile attitude assumed by such forces, either inside or outside Korea, are matters which it is incumbent upon me to bring at once to the attention of the UN."

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would ask the Senator from Ohio whether he believes, in addition to the fact that air power has not yet been effectively used in the Korean theater, whether he believes that we have used sea power effectively, when for a period from the 24th day of June, when the North Korean aggression took place, down to the time when it was demonstrated that the Chinese Communist forces were definitely involved in the Korean episode, we have permitted, day after day, month in and month out, shipments of strategic war supplies into the port cities of Shanghai, Tsingtao, and other ports, which supplies have come not only from Hong Kong, not only from the Middle East, but also from the United States of America? If the United Nations had been alert to this aggression from Red China, as they very properly were concerned with the aggression across the thirty-eighth parallel, would not an effective use of sea power brought about an immediate sea blockade so as to prevent the Chinese Communists from getting oil and equipment with which to try to destroy our forces in Korea?

Mr. TAFT. I think without question a more effective use of sea and air power could have been made, had we not been deluded by the idea that the United Nations was doing something. That is the thing which put us in a weak spot. That is the thing which today prevents our waging war on Communist China, namely, that we are acting only as representatives of the United Nations. I suggest we simply must abandon that theory. We have to engage in our own wars when we think we should engage in them, and not at other times.

Mr. FULBRIGHT and Mr. MORSE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TAFT. I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Before I ask a question I should like to say that the dragging of the feet of the western European countries was not, as I believe, properly described as such. They were in disagreement as to the part the Germans would play, as the Senator well knows, and the French, in view of their history, I think might have some reason to question German participation. I, myself, for my own part, did not agree with the French, though I can understand why they would be nervous about that point. But it is my understanding that generally the French and the British and the Italians, insofar as they are permitted to express an opinion, being under a rather different situation, were in favor of the creation of a land army. The main question I wanted to ask the Senator was this: Did I correctly understand that under his approach to the problem, if Russia moved by land army—which he says we could not stop by air power—and occupied Western Europe, he would then feel that it would at that time be necessary for us, ourselves, to destroy the steel-making capacity of Western Europe, in order to prevent the Russians from making use of it?

Mr. TAFT. We would undoubtedly do so. For example, consider that today we are destroying the port of Inchon, after having made such effective use of it yesterday. Anything that helps the enemy in war is destroyed, there is no question about that. We would, of course, first try to destroy Russian sources of production before destroying the things which they might acquire from other sources. But let me ask the Senator, supposing this land army is set up in Europe, where is the line of defense? So far as I can ascertain from the best military authority, it would probably be the Rhine. To begin with, why would the Germans be interested in a defense on the Rhine? And if we defend the Rhine, the Russians take over all the rest of Germany. It is very difficult to define the line of the Elbe and Czechoslovakia and Austria to the Danube.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would agree with the Senator that any line is difficult to defend. This whole situation is a very difficult one. However, I think that the policy which the Senator has expressed is very startling, in that we would have Western Europe looking to the possibility of being destroyed, if not by the Russians through their own occupation, by us, in order to prevent it. I think it is a very shocking thing for the Europeans to realize that we are willing to contemplate their destruction.

Mr. TAFT. They surely realize it, because that is what happened to Korea. We have saved Korea at the expense of the destruction of every city in Korea and the killing of an infinite number of Korean civilians. I do not believe that we are so welcome in Korea today, and I do not believe we shall be so welcome in Europe tomorrow, if war ever occurs, and if we are the main instigators of the war, or actively cooperating in a war on European soil in which European cities are being destroyed.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not agree with the Senator at this point. I wish to associate myself with the Senator from Illinois in saying that I think the Senator from Ohio is entirely correct in raising these questions in his own speech, which was devoted to principles and not personalities, and I congratulate him on his original speech. However, the Senator from Ohio has also stated that he does not know, as no one knows, what is in the mind of the Kremlin. I believe we will have to assume that those in the Kremlin are planning to advance over Europe, and we have a reasonable, legitimate right, along with the western Europeans, to build an adequate defense for ourselves.

I realize we are dealing with things which there is no way to prove ahead of time. But I believe that for the future of our own country, and for the moral standing of the United States not only before western Europeans, but before all the other peoples of the world, South Americans and everyone else, we must take the position that we will undertake to build a legitimate defense line in Western Europe. Otherwise, the effects would be disastrous to all free people.

Mr. TAFT. The startling thing is not the position I have taken, for what I have stated has been my position on the question we are discussing for the past 2 years, but that we suddenly find ourselves swept into a policy of sending millions of American troops to Europe without any consideration whatever by the people of the Nation as to whether they want to do anything of the kind. That should be the startling thing.

Of course it is proper for me to raise the question. The question is whether we are to drift into a policy or be swept into a policy which is contrary to everything we have done heretofore, and is in no way implied in the Atlantic Pact, and are to be swept into it without even a discussion. I have been complimented by the Senator for raising the issue. It seems to me it is the duty of every Senator to raise the issue.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The point I was making was that the approach of the Senator is entirely different from the attacks of some of our colleagues, which have been devoted, not to the issues involved, but entirely to the personalities of the men involved. That was the real point I was trying to make.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator misunderstood the significance of that particular point.

Coming back to the issue which I think is the central one, so far as I know we have not made any positive commitment as to troops. That is what we are in the process of trying to determine now, in this debate, and in speeches which have already been made by Mr. Hoover and others. The debate is already in progress. I merely desire to make my position clear that I do not agree that, certainly at this point, we should adopt a policy which would prohibit our sending any assistance to Europe, whether it be joined in with and dependent upon assistance which may be forthcoming from other nations.

In other words, in order to illustrate what I mean, suppose the Europeans say, "We are quite willing to raise 50 divisions, but we think you ought to raise 15 or 20."

Mr. TAFT. I do not know whether or not I would be in favor of prohibiting the sending of troops to Europe. I did not go that far. I merely say that Congress should decide how many we are to send, just as when we entered into the United Nations Charter we were very careful to provide expressly that the President could not send troops to help the United Nations except after agreements made, to be approved by the Congress, specifying the number of troops. That was in the United Nations Charter, and that is proper. That is the principle which should apply to the sending of troops to Europe under the Atlantic Pact. It ought to be done, if at all, only under an agreement which meets the approval of the Congress of the United States. I suggest, however, that if that is done it should be limited to something more in the nature of a token force than a leading, key part of an international army.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I understand the Senator to feel that we should not send a land army to Europe. I thought that was his point.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest that we have a few divisions there, and I would not object to having a few more if we got to the point where it was practical, if the other nations would cooperate, so that we would not sacrifice our boys if the Russians attacked the next day. That was my point.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has been on his feet for some time, and I now yield to him.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a few questions, but before doing so I wish to say to him that I think he has delivered the most able address that has been made to date in the presentation of the point of view that we should place our major reliance upon the naval and air defense of the country, rather than upon the use of ground troops abroad. Although I do not share the point of view that is set forth in his major emphasis and major thesis, nevertheless I respect his point of view and his great sincerity in expressing it. I agree with him that it is the duty of every Member of this body to make his position clear in this historic debate. But I do desire to say that I believe the Senator from Ohio has made the most objective and enlightened contribution to the debate on his side of the issue that has been made to date. I disagree with the position he has taken in respect to the implementing of the North Atlantic Pact.

I have some questions in regard to certain assumptions which I think are inherent in the Senator's speech, about which I should like to carry on a brief colloquy with him. The first question goes to the assumption whether the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Oregon would be right if we assumed that Russia to date has given much indication that she intends eventually to take over Europe. Does the Senator from Ohio share that point of view?

Mr. TAFT. I share the point of view that they intend to take it over by Communist infiltration and persuasion. Assuming something I trust will not happen, assuming they took Germany and swept the opposing armies back to the borders of France, I suggest that Russia would stop, that in all probability they would rely on France turning Communist by itself, and that they would probably rely on making some sort of trade arrangements with British socialism, to which Soviet Russia may not object. I doubt very much if Russia would attack France or Britain in a military way.

Answering the Senator's question, I do not believe it is at all clear that the Russians contemplate a military conquest of the world. In the first place, I believe they know it is impossible. It would take them at least a hundred years to build up their sea power so as to enable them to get across the seas. I do not believe they even contemplate a military aggression with their own soldiers against the other nations. In fact, I would not be surprised, if they ever take over Germany, to see them attempt to do it with satellite troops, rather than with the Russian Army.

Mr. MORSE. Then the Senator thinks that Russian conquest of Europe would be by infiltration, if it could be successful, and that it would be doubtful, if she failed by infiltration, that she would proceed militarily?

Mr. TAFT. I am getting into a field which is so largely speculation that I would hesitate to make any statement; but I have stated the direction of the opinion which I entertain.

Mr. MORSE. I know it is in the field of speculation, but from the standpoint of American military policy, we are going to have to speculate as to which of two courses of action Russia may take. I think Russia intends a military defeat of the United States if she can take over Europe.

My next question is, Assuming that Russia should take over Europe either way, by infiltration or by military conquest, does the Senator from Ohio believe that after the conquest of Europe by Russia, America would be in a more weakened position in the world than she would be in if the freedom of Europe could be preserved?

Mr. TAFT. I quite agree with the Senator in his implication, but it seems to me that what is being proposed is not a practical policy. I do not believe it would prevent the calamities which the Senator has in mind.

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator from Ohio think that there is still a possibility of checking Russian expansion in Europe if we make clear to the Kremlin that we intend to resist Russian expansion in Europe?

Mr. TAFT. I do not think it makes very much difference to the Russians whether we have troops in Europe. Frankly, if we made it clear to them that we were going to help Europeans in every way and that we would go to war if Russia attacked the European countries, it would be as big a deterrent as if we added 10 divisions of troops. I do not think our military participation would deter the Russians. In fact, I think it is a little more likely that it would induce them to start another war.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, that is the point I wanted to dwell on in a moment. If we are wise in trying to check Russian expansion by whatever means we adopt, whether it be by means of the Senator's proposal or by means of a proposal by those of us who do not agree fully with the Senator, the time element becomes very important. In that connection I recall that the Senator from Ohio several times raised the question: What is stopping the Russians from proceeding now? If she intends to attack Europe, what is stopping her now? I ask the Senator whether he thinks the great advantage we have over Russia in our stockpile of atomic bombs may be in part what is stopping her from moving now.

Mr. TAFT. It may be a part of the explanation, but I do not think it is the only explanation, or that it is sufficient.

After all, we can make atomic bombs faster than the Russians can make them.

Mr. MORSE. As of now.

Mr. TAFT. We can make them faster than the Russians as of now and as of any time. Certainly we would always be able to outproduce them and to outdo them. Our industrial capacity is greater, and we can move quicker and more efficiently.

Mr. MORSE. But would that not depend on the fortunes of war?

Mr. TAFT. The Russians may have waited until they had the atomic bomb, but I think they will be deterred no matter how many bombs they have. I think the deterrent of our power to bomb Russia will be just as effective.

Mr. MORSE. Would that not depend on the fortunes of war? I refer particularly to the fact that in the early stages of the war they could perhaps destroy our capacity to manufacture bombs.

Mr. TAFT. We should have as good a chance to destroy the Russian capacity to manufacture as they would to destroy the manufacture of bombs in the United States. Our airplanes can fly farther than their airplanes. We should keep ahead of them in every way, including the manufacture of bombs.

Mr. MORSE. I hope that is true, particularly with reference to our air power, but there is beginning to be some doubt about it, it seems to me. However, let us assume that it is true. Does the Senator agree with me that Russia at least will try to take Europe by infiltration? I think she will try it. I think she will try to take Europe by conquest if she fails to take it by infiltration as soon as she feels strong enough and Europe is weak enough. However, did not the Senator overlook the danger of an unfavorable reaction on the part of the free peoples of Europe, if we should take the position that we will rely chiefly on our Navy and Air Force, and will look to them to do all the bleeding on the ground?

Mr. TAFT. I think that has always been the fact. It is not so helpful to them, but neither might the sending of an army to Europe be helpful to them in the end, anymore than it has been helpful in Korea.

Mr. MORSE. Keeping in mind the danger of infiltration, which I think is a real danger, and the apparent hesitancy on the part of some of the European countries to adopt an all-out defense program because they are uncertain as to what we will do and because they fear we will not send in troops to help them if they are attacked, it becomes clear to me that we go through with implementing the North Atlantic Pact including some manpower aid. I think some manpower aid under Eisenhower's command is the best evidence we can give them of our determination to see through with them this contest with communism. I ask the Senator if he does not think that to join manpower with them on a reasonable basis under the North Atlantic Pact is not better rather than to say to them, "We will use only the Navy and Air Force, in the first stages, at least, and leave the dying on the ground for the populations of your countries, and much of that dying caused by our bombs"?

Mr. TAFT. For the past 4 years we have been proceeding on the theory that what we must meet in Europe is Russian infiltration, with which the Senator is concerned. We adopted the Marshall plan with that in mind. I supported economic aid to Europe. I believe such economic aid has helped to build up France and Italy, and has made it possible for them to stand up against communism. I am quite prepared to do anything else which would assist in that general field. So far as Italy is concerned, I think we shall have to continue Marshall-plan aid. That was the whole basis of the Marshall plan, and that whole basis is wiped out the moment we say Russia is going to make a military attack on the European nations.

Mr. MORSE. I believe that is correct.

Mr. TAFT. If we are to proceed now on the basis of a military attack, we have wasted our money under the Marshall plan, because Russia will simply move forward and take over in Europe.

The sending of American soldiers to Europe is a new concept. It is true that one of the reasons I made some concession in sending troops to a limited extent is that once a subject such as that is discussed, it is in a way assumed to be a fact, then to back out causes a bad moral effect. I am willing to go along to some extent because, for one reason, I do not like to give that impression. If the subject had never been mentioned, I do not think there would be any criticism of our not sending troops to Europe. However, the subject has now been discussed, and if we do not send any at all I think it may hurt morale.

Mr. MORSE. As the Senator said in referring to the debate on the North Atlantic Pact, he took exactly the same position at the time the North Atlantic Fact was debated as he takes this afternoon. I think the Senator will recall that at the time of the debate on the North Atlantic Pact he and I engaged in a colloquy, along with several other Senators. At that time the junior Senator from Oregon agreed with the Senator from Ohio that the moral obligations of the pact carried along with them the military implementation of the pact. I never agreed with the former Senator from New York, Mr. Dulles, when he said on the floor of the Senate that the pact would not carry along with it the clear moral obligation to implement it militarily.

Mr. TAFT. With equipment, that is.

Mr. MORSE. With equipment and with men.

Mr. TAFT. That question practically never arose. Except for the one statement by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] I could not find anywhere in the debate any suggestion or thought that we were being committed to send soldiers to Europe; and the Senator from Texas denied any commitment.

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to go over the RECORD at a later time and discuss the subject further with the Senator from Ohio. The junior Senator from Oregon took the position that the Atlantic Pact carried along with it the clear moral obligation to stand together with the countries of Europe in case of an attack on any one of them by Russia.

Mr. TAFT. I will add to my statement. I did not mean to say that if an attack were made on Europe by Russia that we would not send troops to Europe. What I insisted on was that, if that time should ever come, we should have complete freedom to fight the war as we wanted to fight it. In the light of the great changes in military tactics and practices we should not tie our hands to fight a particular kind of war in a particular way, such as sending soldiers to Europe.

Mr. MORSE. I desire to be accurate and fair in referring to some assumptions which I think the Senator from Ohio has made in his address today. I think an assumption he made is to the effect that we could not, under the Atlantic Pact, if we fully implemented it, as is contemplated under the Brussels discussion, check the Russians from a military conquest of Europe. That is different from saying that we can march to Moscow. I think there is a serious doubt about the assumption of the Senator from Ohio that we could not check a Russian advance over Europe if we were properly to implement the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. TAFT. I think that possibly after 3 or 4 years of building up our Armed Forces we could do it. I wondered why the Russians should allow us to do it.

Mr. MORSE. My reply to the Senator is that I think there is every evidence that the reason is that they know that if they attack now they would become involved in an atomic war. I am satisfied that they are not ready to fight an atomic war now. They are afraid of the tremendous devastation which would occur to Russia, if they attacked Europe now. That is why I think the next 2 or 3 years are precious and important in bringing about an implementation of the North Atlantic Pact on the ground, because if we do not take advantage of our opportunity, in 3 or 4 years we may not have superiority in atomic bombs.

Mr. TAFT. I do not agree with the Senator. I do not think the Russians are being held back today simply because they do not have enough atomic bombs. That seems to me to be an improbable explanation, although I cannot deny it absolutely.

Mr. MORSE. If I may ask the Senator from Ohio one more question, I agree with him that so-called executive agreements which involve foreign commitments must be brought to an end. I think the President of the United States has the good-faith responsibility to the people of the United States to submit proposed commitments or understandings to Congress for approval in advance of entering into them, because in my opinion, every time the President enters into such an agreement, in view of present world conditions, he circumvents the advice-and-consent clause of the Constitution with respect to treaties, because such an agreement amounts to an alliance and is in effect a treaty.

Mr. TAFT. I fully agree with the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. In the light of that agreement with the Senator from Ohio, I should like to ask him another question. Does not the Senator from Ohio believe, turning to Asia for a moment, that so far as China and the United States are concerned, the leaders of Communist China consider themselves at war with the United States?

Mr. TAFT. They do. I do not think they talk about the United Nations. I think they represent to their people in their propaganda and their broadcasting that it is the American aggressor against whom they are directing their armies.

Mr. MORSE. Does not the Senator agree with me that we should proceed, through our Chief Executive and the State Department, to an immediate understanding with our allies in the United Nations as to what their position is concerning United Nations treatment of Communist China, which today is killing American boys by the thousands?

Mr. TAFT. I think so. However, I still feel that regardless of what we do about the United Nations, we should not now change our military policy, whatever it may be, because of some reliance on what the United Nations may do.

Mr. FLANDERS and Mr. SALTONSTALL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TAFT. I think perhaps the Senator from Vermont was first on his feet.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, it strikes me that at this moment, under the intelligent initiative of the senior Senator from Ohio, we are witnessing the beginning of one of the great historic debates in the Senate. I should like to make a suggestion, if I may, to the leaders on the Democratic side as well as the leaders on the Republican side, that after the President has delivered his message, this debate be regularized in what is perhaps a new way. I suggest that a unanimous-consent agreement be reached between the leaders on both sides of the aisle so as to allow an adequate amount of time, not for the discussion of some particular measure, but for the discussion of the foreign policy of the United States. I suggest that this debate be conducted under the leadership of two Senators from opposite sides of the aisle, representing opposing points of view, with time restricted and allocated in the same way that it is done when we are approaching a vote on a given measure.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question along the lines of the questions asked by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. First, I congratulate the Senator from Ohio for the thoroughness and ableness of his speech.

Secondly, I entirely agree with him that we should have open debate on the subject, and that the President should not go ahead and do things by executive authority when the subjects with which he deals should properly be considered by the Congress.

The Senator from Ohio has said that he agrees that we would be weaker if Europe were taken over by the Communists, either by infiltration or by conquest. The Senator emphasizes the importance of sea and air power. It seems to me that the entire basis of the discussion has been rather on a pessimistic note—that Europe will probably be taken over unless we put extensive manpower into Europe.

I agree that Europe cannot be defended by us if the Europeans will not defend themselves. But at the present time must we not give them the spirit and feeling that we are going to support them, if they are necessary and helpful to us in the long run and to our way of life here? Must we not give them, by whatever means is within our power, the feeling that we are going to help them in the present situation if they are willing really to help themselves?

Mr. TAFT. Have we not already done so? What is the difference, so far as morale is concerned, between promising 5 divisions and promising 20 divisions? If we promise 5, it will be said that that is not enough, that we must furnish 20 divisions to uphold their morale—or 30 or 40 divisions. We could go on indefinitely. We started by aiding them economically. Then we proceeded to aid them with arms. Now it is proposed that we aid them with men, in order to uphold their morale. Where are we to stop? I have tried to suggest a place where I think we must stop. I have suggested that there is a limitation on the number of men we can hold in a permanent land army in this country. There is a limit to the economic strength we have to support such an army. There is even a limit to the will of the people to support such an army. If we impose a limit, we cannot commit the entire American Army to Europe. If we are to have an army of 1,500,000 men, we cannot undertake to commit them all to Europe, and we ought not to commit any very large part of them to Europe, in my opinion, and leave none for our own defense or for other sections of the world.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not better to make perfectly clear to Europe what we are willing to do, and call upon the Europeans to add sufficient of their own forces to give us the feeling that they mean business, rather than to give them the feeling that they cannot count on any assistance from us on the ground? Is it not better to make clear what we are willing to do, within reasonable limits?

Mr. TAFT. I have not suggested that the Europeans cannot count on any assistance. I have suggested that there should be some assistance, provided the program is practical, and that we would not be merely sacrificing a large number of American boys. I dislike to send many more divisions to Europe. At the present moment there are no divisions to send, so we shall not have the problem for some time to come; but I do not think we ought to promise to send them when we have them.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. We cannot afford to be anything but practical. We must not make promises which we cannot keep. I entirely agree with that position. As I understand the Senator from Ohio, he believes that we should be practical in our aid and make clear what aid we can give over a long period of time, and that we should make perfectly evident to the people of Europe what we will do, and then see what they will do.

Mr. TAFT. I do not wish to assume the initiative. If the Europeans want this help, I think they ought to come and ask us for it. I think they ought to assume the job of making up the international army and come to us and say, "We would like to have you provide so many divisions." I think we make a mistake in butting into Europe and assuming the leadership of the entire European community, particularly when it is to a large extent beyond our power.

One of the things which I have tried to emphasize is that the initiative ought to come from the Europeans. We ought not be pushing them every minute to build up their military budget and build up a great army against Russia, we will say, whether for defense or for attack.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question along that line?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As I see it, we are all agreed that what we must do is to protect our country and our way of life. We must take the initiative for that objective. Is it not fair to ask, How far does that initiative go outside the limits of this country?

Mr. TAFT. Surely it is a question of degree; but it certainly seems to me that we should not assume the initiative in this particular project in Europe. That is why I dislike the idea of having an American commander in chief of such an army as is finally set up. Then it will be the Americans who will be leading. Our action will be represented as American aggression. We shall be constantly called upon for more and more troops, because we are the ones who are pushing the project. That is one of the difficulties.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Does not the Senator agree that we must take whatever practical steps are necessary to defend our own country to the best of our ability?

Mr. TAFT. Oh, yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So it is a question of degree, really, as to how far to go—a question of degree with respect to initiative, and a question of degree with respect to what is practical in going forward outside this country. It becomes a question of how to be most practical in the defense of our country.

Mr. TAFT. It is a question of how much we can do, and whether what we are proposing to do is going to be effective, or will lead only to the sacrifice of a large number of American boys. There are a dozen questions to determine, among which is the question of how large a permanent army we can maintain for 5 or 10 years. That is a serious problem.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I agree entirely with the Senator that when we are dealing with the practical question of how to go about our own self-defense in this country and in Europe, we should have the fullest debate and should have the fullest information from the executive department.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, like all those who have interrupted the Senator from Ohio, I wish to express my own personal appreciation that he has initiated this debate upon a high plane. I should like to say, however, that there were two assumptions, it seems to me, implicit in his address which, so far as I know, are not borne out by any facts which have been revealed to me. The Senator seems to assume that we are preparing to form a huge land army to send to Europe to defend European nations who are unwilling to defend themselves. I happen to be a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. TAFT. No; with due respect to the Senator, I will say I have assumed always that if we send an army to Europe, there will be some agreement on the part of other nations to provide troops, too. I would not assume that they are not willing to defend themselves. I say they do not seem to be eager to rush out and increase their military forces themselves, and that shows perhaps that the whole program was not so necessary as we thought it was.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator then wishes to be understood as not indicating a belief that there is any present plan to raise a huge land army of American boys to be sent into Europe, there to be the victims of Communist aggression?

Mr. TAFT. My impression is that the program is very vague, I must say. But I have heard as many as 20 divisions mentioned. If we are going to try to maintain 20 divisions in Europe, we will need for that purpose, as I figure it, about 1,000,000 men under arms for that purpose alone, without anything to do with the rest of the world or garrisoning this country. So it looks to me as if it involves a pretty heavy land army.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As the Senator himself has just said, that is a vague conclusion. Of course, there have been suggestions of various kinds. But I want to tell the Senator and the Senate, and make the record here, that as a member of the Appropriations Committee I have interrogated all the leading officials of the Department of Defense from Secretary of Defense Marshall down, before the Committee on Appropriations, and I can say that I definitely did not receive from any of them in response to my questions, some of which were on the record and some of which were off the record, any impression that there is any plan to raise an army of American boys to defend a Europe which was unwilling or unable to defend itself.

I quite agree with the Senator from Ohio—and I have stated this over and over again upon the floor of the Senate—that we ought to depend upon the most complete development of our Air Force, the most complete development of our submarine forces, and of our antisubmarine vessels. We ought to understand clearly that we cannot by any possibility compete in manpower with Soviet Russia and its satellites, the people of which the Russian dictators seem to be willing to use as cannon fodder. I know of no respectable opinion in the Government which wishes to commit American boys to any such futile effort as that.

It ought to be understood that if we are deficient in air power—and I am ready to say now that we still have the best air force in the world in spite of the fact that the Russians have been building up—if we have not built up our air and naval power as it should have been built up, it is not possible to attempt to place the blame without remembering how ready so many of us were ready only a short time ago to economize at the expense of military power. There was widespread hope for early peace through the United Nations, and a great desire to cut the cost of Government.

I have in my hand, Mr. President, the report of the Hoover Commission on National Security Organization, which was made to the Congress of the United States in February 1949. From page 11 I read these two paragraphs:

> The present budget of the Armed Forces represents about $100 per capita for the Nation as contrasted with some two and one-fourth dollars before the First World War. Our task force reports that the current preliminary budget estimates of the three military departments for the fiscal year 1950 were for more than $30,000,000,000.
> Such a budget—

The Hoover Commission went on—> would be justifiable only if the Nation were actually involved in war. It would require a sharp reduction in production from civilian consumption, precipitate the needs for controls over the economy, and enormously increase inflationary pressure. It reflects a lack of realistic understanding by the three military departments of the economic and social factors of national security.

The conclusions which are expressed there in the Hoover Commission report as to the effect of high expenditures are perfectly correct. An appropriation of $30,000,000,000 for defense would produce inflationary pressures and would require controls. But at that time the desire for economy in Federal expenditures was so great that even though the then Secretary of Defense, Mr. Forrestal, was seeking to increase the Air Force and modernize the Navy, the great pressure for economy throughout the United States was such that Mr. Forrestal was compelled to take his budget back. It was reduced from $30,000,000,000 to $24,000,000,000, then to $18,000,000,000, and then, as I recall, to about twelve and one-half billion dollars.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator from Wyoming suggests that the Army says they are not contemplating sending any troops, but I call his attention to the fact that before we heard of the Korean War the Army had not the slightest intention of sending any soldiers to Korea. That was done overnight without even notifying the Congress that it was being done.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That was done through the United Nations, under the United Nations organization, and the action was applauded on this floor.

Mr. TAFT. I do not know what the program is going to be, but I see it coming; and all I want to do is to raise this question and have the issue debated before we get ourselves so committed that our hands in Congress are practically tied.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very happy, indeed, that the Senator has opened the debate upon that plane. We all want a factual discussion. I do not want to commit American boys to warfare in Europe because I do not believe we can begin to compete with the manpower of the masses who are under the domination of the Kremlin, and we should not attempt to do so.

I call attention to the fact, Mr. President, that it is not of the present year alone or of last year that we were slow to realize what technological improvement and technological defense are. I remember very well when as a member of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate at the beginning of World War II the then Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, was definitely of the opinion that our air forces were strong enough, though we had practically no air force at all. At the suggestion of the Secretary of War, the Appropriations Committee refused to adopt an amendment which I offered in the committee, to make an increased appropriation for building up our air power. I took that amendment to the floor of the Senate. I was pleased when the Senate adopted the amendment, and that the appropriation bill went to the House of Representatives with unbudgeted funds which the Secretary of War had not approved, for the building up of an American Air Force. The appropriation was stricken out in conference.

Only 16 months ago, in August 1949, we had the same debate all over again, namely, whether the United States Air Force should be expanded.

It is true, as the Senator from Ohio has said in his speech, that the Finletter Commission had suggested a 70-group air force. It is true that the Congress in the appropriation bill that year provided funds for a 58 group air force. It is true that, even though that appropriation was made, the money was not spent by reason of an Executive order of the President of the United States; but it is also true that, when the matter was voted upon on the floor of the Senate, there were only 9 Members of this body who voted against reducing the appropriation from one sufficient for a 58-group air force to one sufficient for a 48-group air force. The record of that vote will be found on page 12315 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 26, 1949.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to take my seat while the Senator from Wyoming completes his question. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the request of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I ask that I be allowed to take my seat during the remainder of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I do not object; but I wish to say that I had asked my question, and the Senator from Ohio had answered it; and he then was kind enough to indulge me while I was making some remarks on my own.

However, I am very glad that the Senator remains in the Chamber, because I think it is very important that in the development of this debate we should have clearly in mind the various factors which have controlled our action as we have gone along step by step.

I was saying that the record of that Senate vote on the size of the United States Air Force appears on page 12315 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 26, 1949. The nine Senators who that day voted for a 58-group Air Force, and voted against a reduction to a 48-group Air Force, were the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Florida, Mr. Pepper, the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. Three other Senators, including the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], who is now on the floor, were absent on that day, but were paired against the reduction of the Air Force. The others were the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK]. My colleague the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT] was absent by leave of the Senate on official business in Europe. I recite this, not to criticize any of the Senators who voted against the larger Air Force—and that vote occurred only a year ago last August—but merely to point out how difficult it has been to comprehend the great problems of international relationships which confront us and how necessary it is now not to forget what was done and not done in years past.

If the United Nations should be a delusion, if the United Nations should not be effective to preserve the peace of the world—although there is no indication to date that it will not be finally effective, that it will not continue to resist aggression, and that the Assembly of the United Nations will not, indeed, prove to be what the great senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] called it, namely, the Town Meeting of the World—but if the fact should be otherwise, then we shall indeed be condemned to become a garrison state, the dangers of which the Senator from Ohio, if I understood him correctly, clearly comprehends—a garrison state compelling us to take young men out of normal pursuits, out of industry, out of science, out of various educational pursuits, and put them under arms, with the manual of arms in their hands, instead of training them in science and other peacetime professions and callings. Then, indeed, the world may be condemned to the most terrible bath of blood mankind ever was forced to endure.

Mr. President, I am happy that the opportunity has come to us to discuss foreign-relations problems in good temper, with all the intelligence we can command. I think it is a very fortunate circumstance that the debate has opened in the tone in which it was launched by the Senator from Ohio.

Let us not assume that in the past all the mistakes were on one side. They were not. Let us not assume that there were men of great vision and public responsibility whose voices were raised but disregarded, because that is not the fact. We have been motivated by conflicting purposes. The people of America have never wanted war and they have accepted it only when it seemed unavoidable. They do not want to go to war now. Of course, they seek to avoid everything of a militaristic character. But, above all else in the world, the people of America desire freedom and liberty.

When the appropriate time comes, Mr. President, I shall seek to take the floor to make some observations upon steps which I think the Government of the United States may take to convince peoples throughout the world that they can obtain without war the things the human mind and heart and body desire; but we must not permit ourselves to drift, as the Senator from Ohio says, or to be driven into a false concept that only war can be the solution of our problems.

I thank the Senator from Ohio for having permitted me to make these remarks in his time.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

SUMMARY OF EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT OF 1950

Mr. McCARTHY obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there has been prepared, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, a summary of House bill 9827, the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1950. Inasmuch as many calls will be made upon Senators for information which may be supplied by this statement by the joint committee, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, consent is given that this information be printed in the body of the RECORD.

The summary is as follows:

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT OF 1950 AS AGREED TO BY THE CONFEREES

The bill provides for the raising of revenue by the levying of a corporate excess-profits tax effective as of July 1, 1950, and a 2-percentage-point increase in the corporate surtax rate effective with respect to taxable years beginning on and after July 1, 1950.

It is estimated that the bill will produce about $3,300,000,000 annually when fully effective under the levels of corporate profits existing in the calendar year 1950 and between $4,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000 under the levels of corporate profits which may reasonably be expected in the calendar year 1951. At the levels of corporate profits present in 1950, the 2-percentage-point increase in the corporate surtax rate will yield about $600,000,000 annually. The balance of the $3,300,000,000, or $2,700,000,000 is attributable to the excess-profits tax.

At the levels of corporate profits present in 1950 about 70,000 corporations will pay an excess-profits tax. The surtax-rate increase will apply to these corporations and to 30,000 others which will not be liable for excess-profits tax.

1. THE RATE, THE BASE, AND THE YEARS OF APPLICATION

(a) The corporate surtax: The bill increases the surtax rate under the regular corporate income tax by 2 percentage points with respect to taxable years beginning on and after July 1, 1950. Thus the total normal and surtax rate will be 47 percent for such taxable years. Since no increase is made in the corporate normal tax rate, the rate on income of $25,000 and less remains at 23 percent for 1950 and 25 percent for 1951 and subsequent years.

(b) The excess-profits tax: The bill imposes an additional excess-profits-tax rate of 30 percent which together with the regular corporate normal tax and surtax represents a total rate of 77 percent when fully effective. The combined rate of 77 percent on adjusted excess-profits-net income is comparable to the excess-profits-tax rate of 85½ percent at the end of World War II, that is, the 95-percent rate reduced by the 10-percent-postwar refund.

Under the bill, the combined rate of the corporate income tax, including the 2-percent tax on consolidated returns, and the excess-profits tax cannot exceed a 62-percent ceiling rate, applied to the corporation's excess-profits net income. Under the World War II tax a similar ceiling limited the combined rate of the corporate income tax and excess-profits tax to slightly more than 72 percent of the surtax net income after allowance for the postwar credit.

As in the case of the World War II tax, the taxpayer is given the choice of the higher of two alternative bases in determining what proportion, if any, of its income is to be subjected to excess-profits tax. The primary credit is an average earnings credit, based on the average income for 3 out of the 4 years 1946 to 1949. The alternative is a credit based on a rate of return on invested capital. A similar choice was provided in the World War II law.

The excess-profits tax is made effective in 1950 for calendar-year corporations by imposing for that year approximately one-half the tax which will apply in subsequent years. Thus, the excess-profits-tax rate applicable to these calendar-year corporations in 1950 is about 15 percent which, when combined with the corporate normal tax and surtax, will represent a total rate of about 57 percent. The excess-profits tax does not apply to years ending prior to July 1, 1950. In the case of a corporation with a year beginning prior to and ending after July 1, 1950, the excess-profits tax imposed will be a percentage of the 30-percent excess-profits-tax rate computed on the basis of the full year's income. The percentage is to be determined by dividing the number of days in the taxable year after June 30, 1950, by the total number of days in the taxable year. These rules are similar to those applied for 1950 to fiscal-year corporations in making the changes in the corporate normal tax and surtax rates under the Revenue Act of 1950.

The bill provides that the excess-profits tax shall terminate as of June 30, 1953. For corporations with years beginning before July 1, 1953, and ending after June 30, 1953, the same procedures will be used with respect to the termination of the tax as in the case of the initial imposition of the tax.

2. RELATIONSHIP OF THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX TO THE INCOME TAX

The excess-profits tax is an additional tax over and above the other corporate income taxes. In general the excess-profits tax is computed as follows:

(a) First, the income tax is imposed on the entire amount of taxable net income.

(b) Second, the normal tax net income, after certain adjustments, is reduced by the excess-profits credit (that is, the portion of the corporation's income which for the purposes of this tax is considered normal) and any unused excess-profits credits carried forward or back to the taxable year. The result is called the adjusted excess-profits-net income.

(c) Third, the excess-profits tax at the rate of 30 percent is imposed on this adjusted excess profits net income. This, when added to the aggregate normal and surtax of 47 percent produces a 77-percent rate on adjusted excess profits net income.

Under the World War II excess-profits tax the so-called two-basket approach was followed. The corporate income tax was imposed only on income which was not subject to the excess-profits tax, and the excess-profits tax (comparable to the 77 percent tax referred to above) was imposed on income in excess of the excess-profits credit.

Substantially the same tax burdens are achieved under either method of computation, but under the approach in this bill the normal tax and surtax can be computed without regard to the excess-profits tax, and subsequent adjustments in the excess-profits credit will not require a recomputation of the normal and surtax. Also, the method used in the bill permits the unification of procedures for assessing and collecting the other income taxes and the excess-profits tax. The income tax and the excess-profits tax will be treated as one tax for the purpose of the computation of interest on refunds or deficiencies, the statute of limitations for assessment and refund purposes, the sending of 90-day letters, and so forth.

The consolidated return privilege is made available as in the World War II statute.

3. THE MINIMUM CREDIT UNDER THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

The bill provides a minimum credit of $25,000. Any taxpayer which upon computing its excess-profits tax credit under either the average earnings or invested capital method finds that its credit is less than $25,000 may raise its credit to this amount. In contrast to this the World War II law provided all taxpayers with a specific exemption of $10,000.

4. THE AVERAGE EARNINGS CREDIT UNDER THE EXCESS PROFITS TAX

(a) The selection of the base period and the percentage of earnings taken into account: Taxpayers using the calendar year have a base period under the bill consisting of the 4 years, 1946 through 1949. Such taxpayers will eliminate their poorest year in this base period, adjust the income of the remaining 3 years in a manner to be described below, and calculate from the adjusted income of these 3 years an average base period net income. This average is then reduced by 15 percent for the purposes of the average-earnings credit. Alternative average base period net incomes which may be elected by qualified taxpayers under certain relief provisions described below are also reduced by 15 percent.

Taxpayers with fiscal years ending after December 31 but before April 1 will use as their base period the last four consecutive taxable years ending prior to April 1, 1950. They will follow the same procedure as calendar year taxpayers eliminating the poorest of the four taxable years falling within their base period.

A somewhat different procedure is followed in the case of taxpayers whose fiscal years end after March 31 and before December 31. Such taxpayers are required to use 36 months out of the 48-month period beginning on January 1, 1946, and ending on December 31, 1949. In determining the 36-month period they must eliminate the worst of the following: (a) Any one of the three taxable years falling completely within the period January 1, 1946, through December 31, 1949; (b) the portions in the base period of their two taxable years which fall only partially within the period January 1, 1946, through December 31, 1949; or (c) one of the portions of these two taxable years falling partially within this period plus enough months in the adjoining taxable year in the period to make up a total of 12 months within the period.

Under the World War II law the corresponding credit was 95 percent of the taxpayer's average earnings in the period 1936 through 1939. Also, under the World War II law the earnings of the poorest of the 4 years could be raised to 75 percent of the average of the other 3 years, but the earnings of no year could be eliminated.

(b) Counting deficit years as zero years: In addition to eliminating the poorest year in its base period, the taxpayer counts the earnings of any remaining deficit year as zero. Under the World War II law there was no corresponding provision.

(c) Capital additions during the latter base period years: The average earnings credit is increased under the bill to reflect one-half of the net additions to capital in 1948 and all of the net additions to capital in 1949. The increase is 12 percent of such investment. If they take the form of equity capital or retained earnings, 100 percent of such investments are counted. In the case of borrowed capital only three-fourths of such investments are counted. The 12-percent rate is the same rate of return allowed for net additions to capital in the years in which the excess-profits tax is applicable and is the maximum rate of return allowed those using the invested capital base. There was no comparable provision under the World War II law.

5. INVESTED CAPITAL CREDIT

Under the bill the excess-profits credit of a corporation using the invested-capital method is the sum of its invested-capital credit (reduced by an amount bearing the same relationship to the credit as its inadmissible assets bear to its total assets) and its new capital credit. The invested-capital credit of a corporation includes equity capital, retained earnings, and borrowed capital.

(a) Rates of return on invested capital: The same rates of return are allowed under the bill for equity capital, retained earnings, and borrowed capital. In the case of equity capital and retained earnings the rates of return are applied to the full amount of such investments. In the case of borrowed capital the rates are applied to three-fourths of such investments, and one-quarter of the interest payments are deductible in the current tax year in computing income subject to excess-profits tax. Under the World War II law the full amount of the investment was taken into consideration in the case of equity capital and retained earnings, but the rates of return were applied to only one-half of the borrowed capital, and one-half of the interest payments were deductible in computing income subject to excess-profits tax.

Table 1 shows the rates of return allowed on invested capital under the bill and the World War II law.

TABLE 1.—Rates of return allowed on equity capital, retained earnings, and borrowed capital under H. R. 9827 and the World War II statute [1]

Under $5,000,000	12	8
$5,000,000 to $10,000,000	10	6
Over $10,000,000	8	5

[1] Under the bill the capital in each bracket includes ¾ of the borrowed capital and under the World War II law it included ½ of the borrowed capital.

Table 2 shows, for funds borrowed at specified interest rates, the effective rates of return allowed on the total borrowed capital under the bill and the World War II statute, giving effect to the deduction of one-fourth of the interest payments under this bill and one-half of the interest payments allowed in the case of the World War II statute.

6 percent	10½	9	7½	7	6	5½
7 percent	10¾	9¼	7¾	7½	6½	6
8 percent	11	9½	8	8	7	6½

(b) Definition of equity capital and retained earnings: Under the bill the equity capital and retained earnings of a corporation are generally determined by deducting from its total assets on its books at the end of the base period the sum of the liabilities on its books at the same time, plus any "recent loss" adjustment.

The value of the assets is determined, in the case of all assets other than intangible assets, by taking their "adjusted basis for gain," which is their cost or March 1, 1913, value, whichever is higher, plus or minus subsequent adjustments in basis. The value of intangible assets is determined without regard to the value of the property as of March 1, 1913. Intangible assets are defined as "secret processes and formulae, good will, trade-marks, trade brands, franchises, and other like property."

Assets which are not held in good faith for the purposes of the business are excluded in computing invested capital.

The "recent loss" adjustment referred to above, which is added to the net assets, is the net deficit, if any, in the period 1946–49, or 1940–49, whichever is the greater. The net deficit is the excess, if any, of operating losses over net income in the period.

In addition to permitting the taxpayer to compute its equity capital and retained earnings by the asset method described above, the bill provides the taxpayer with the alternative of computing its invested capital under the so-called historical capital approach used in the World War II statute. Under the historical capital approach, the equity capital and retained earnings represent the money and property previously paid in for stock or paid in for surplus plus the accumulated earnings and profits of the corporation as of the beginning of its taxable year. A major difference between this approach and the asset approach is in the treatment of deficits. Under the historical capital approach, a net deficit—that is, any deficit remaining after offsetting deficits of loss years against earnings of profitable years—does not decrease paid-in capital or paid-in surplus. Under the asset approach, a net deficit incurred prior to 1946 or 1940 has the effect of reducing capital or surplus paid in prior to that date. However, under the asset approach, a net deficit incurred for the period 1940 to 1949 or 1946 to 1949 reduces neither capital nor surplus paid in at any time; nor earnings and profits realized prior to 1940 or 1946. Thus, in this respect, the asset approach is more favorable to corporations with recent losses, while the historical capital approach is more favorable to corporations with net deficits over the whole span of their existence. However, under the historical capital approach (but not under the asset approach), a net deficit in the base period which has not been utilized for carryback purposes can be carried forward to reduce the excess-profits net income for 1950 and 1951. On the other hand, under the asset approach, new capital additions in the tax period are provided for at a flat 12-percent rate of return, while under the historical capital approach new capital additions in the tax period are provided for at a rate of return of 12 percent, 10 percent, or 8 percent, depending on the asset bracket of the corporation.

The bill provides in the case of insurance companies, other than mutual and other than life or marine, that equity capital and retained earnings shall include 50 percent of reserves required by law (except those constituting borrowed capital). In the case of mutual insurance companies (other than life or marine), the bill provides that equity capital and retained earnings include surplus as well as 50 percent of reserves required by law. The organization expenses of these insurance companies are included in the computation of equity capital for purposes of the invested capital credit.

In arriving at the equity capital and retained earnings of a bank under the asset approach the bill defines liabilities as excluding reserves for bad debts. Since liabilities are deducted from total assets in arriving at equity capital and retained earnings, the exclusion of reserves for bad debts from liabilities has the effect of increasing the equity capital credit.

(c) Definition of borrowed capital: Borrowed capital is indebtedness (not including interest) which is evidenced by a bond, note, bill of exchange, debenture, certificate of indebtedness, mortgage, deed of trust, bank loan agreement, or conditional sales contract. However, the amount to be considered as borrowed capital is limited to outstanding indebtedness "incurred in good faith for the purposes of the business." The definition of borrowed capital is substantially the same as the definition appearing in the World War II statute except for the addition of conditional sales contracts and bank loan agreements. The latter include indebtedness to a bank, but do not include the indebtedness of a bank to its depositors.

In the case of insurance companies 66⅔ percent of the unearned premiums are to be treated as borrowed capital. In the case of a life-insurance company 66⅔ percent of the adjusted reserves and 66⅔ percent of the reserves on certain annuity contracts are to be treated as borrowed capital. Since 75 percent of borrowed capital is taken into account in computing the rate of return on invested capital, treating 66⅔ percent of these unearned premiums or reserves on annuity contracts as borrowed capital means that 50 percent of them are taken into account in computing the invested capital credit.

In the case of a face-amount certificate company 66⅔ percent of the reserves on its outstanding investment certificates are treated as borrowed capital. As in the case of insurance companies, this means that 50 percent of these certificates will be taken into account in computing the invested capital credit.

(d) Admissible and inadmissible assets: The World War II statute had the effect of reducing the capital, to which the various rates of return were applied in order to determine the invested capital credit, by the so-called inadmissible assets. These included stock in a corporation and State and local government and partially tax-exempt Federal obligations. However, in the case of such Government obligations the taxpayer had the option to treat them as admissible assets if it included in its excess-profits-tax net income the interest received on them.

The bill makes no major change in the World War II treatment of admissible and inadmissible assets except to deny the option to treat State and local government and partially tax-exempt Federal obligations as admissible assets.

6. NET CAPITAL CHANGES IN THE TAX YEARS

Under the bill, both the taxpayer using the average earnings credit and the taxpayer using the invested capital credit, if the latter is computed under the asset approach, are allowed to increase their credit by a flat 12 percent of the net additions to their investment since 1949. However, in the case of net additions taking the form of borrowed capital, only 75 percent of the additional investment is taken into account in applying the 12-percent rate of return. The taxpayer computing its invested capital base under the historical capital approach receives a rate of return on net capital additions in the tax period of 12 percent, 10 percent, or 8 percent, depending upon its rate bracket.

Reductions in invested capital in the tax period decrease prior additions in the tax period at the same rate allowed on the increases. Thus, in the case of the average earnings taxpayer and the invested capital taxpayer using the asset approach the excess-profits credit is reduced by 12 percent of any reductions which offset additions previously made in the tax period. In the case of the invested capital taxpayer using the historical capital approach, the rate of return by which the excess-profits tax is reduced depends upon its top invested capital rate bracket, which may be 12 percent, 10 percent, or 8 percent. Any reductions in excess of the additions in the tax years decrease the credit of all invested capital taxpayers by the rates of return used in building up their credit initially. For the average earnings taxpayer, the rate of return applied to such net capital reductions is 12 percent.

In the case of the average earnings taxpayer no allowance was made under the World War II statute for investments in the tax years if they took the form of borrowed capital or accumulations of retained earnings. An increase in the credit was allowed at an 8-percent rate of return if the additions took the form of paid-in capital or paid-in surplus and a 6-percent rate of return was used for reductions of these types.

In the case of the invested capital taxpayer the World War II statute included retained earnings and borrowed capital in the ordinary computation of invested capital at the regular rates for such capital. Additions to paid-in capital or paid-in surplus were also included in the credit at the ordinary rates but as a special incentive they were included at 125 percent of their value.

7. EXCESS PROFITS NET INCOME IN THE TAXABLE YEAR

(a) General: The net income used in the excess-profits tax is an adjusted version of the net income to which the 25-percent corporate normal tax is applied. Chief among the adjustments is an exclusion of capital gains and losses, both long- and short-term, from the sale or exchange of capital assets. The World War II law excluded only long-term gains and losses.

Casualty losses, losses on abandonment, and the excess of losses over gains from involuntary conversions and the sale or exchange of property used in the trade or business (117 (j) losses) are allowed as deductions in computing excess-profits net income. The excess of gains over losses (117 (j) gains) are not included in excess-profits net income since they are treated as gains from the sale or exchange of capital assets.

Like the World War II law the bill excludes certain other types of sporadic income, such as—

(1) income arising out of the retirement or repurchase at less than the issue price of bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness, outstanding for more than 6 months;

(2) income arising from the recovery of bad debts in cases where no deduction has been claimed in a year for which an excess-profits tax was imposed under the World War II law or would be imposed under this bill; and

(3) refunds of taxes paid under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933.

The bill excludes 75 percent of the portion of the taxpayer's interest deduction which represents interest on the indebtedness included in the taxpayer's borrowed capital if it uses the invested capital basis. This is consistent with the inclusion of 75 percent of borrowed capital in the taxpayer's invested capital base.

The net income of the excess-profits tax year is also corrected by the elimination of deductions arising out of the retirement at a premium of bonds and other evidences of indebtedness outstanding for more than 6 months. Such an adjustment was provided under the World War II law, but only in the correction of the base period net income. Under the bill the adjustment is also made in the income of the tax period.

As in the World War II law, the net income of life insurance companies is adjusted for contributions to policyholders' reserves so as to conform income for excess-profits-tax purposes with the adjusted net income used in the case of such companies for the corporate normal tax and surtax. If the company computes its excess profits credit on the invested capital basis, the adjustment for contributions to policyholders' reserves is reduced by 50 percent because in effect 50 percent of such reserves are included in the calculation of the invested capital credit.

Taxpayers in certain extractive industries are permitted to exclude a portion of their income from "excess output," in a manner somewhat similar to that provided under the World War II legislation. Amounts received as incentive payments to encourage exploration, development, and mining for defense purposes are excluded both for the purposes of the excess profits tax and the corporate normal tax and surtax.

The bill follows the precedent of the World War II law in allowing a full 100-percent credit for dividends received from domestic corporations. While the World War II law allowed a full credit for dividends in kind, the bill restricts the credit for such dividends to the adjusted basis of the distributed property in the hands of the distributing corporation. This conforms the treatment of dividends in kind under the excess-profits tax with that under the corporate normal tax and surtax as revised by section 122 of the Revenue Act of 1950.

The bill contains a provision allowing the correction of the net income of the excess-profits-tax years for other abnormalities. This provision is similar to section 721 of the World War II law. Generally, income appearing in particular excess-profits-tax years is reallocated under this provision if it is attributable to events that occurred or work that was done in other years. Such an adjustment is made only if the income of the class deemed to be abnormal, which is received in the taxable year, is more than 115 percent of the average amount of the income of the same class received during the four previous taxable years. In appropriate cases such an excess will be attributed to other years under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Adjustments of this type are limited to income arising out of—

(1) a claim, award, judgment, or decree;

(2) exploration, discovery, or prospecting which extended over a period of more than 12 months;

(3) the sale of patents, formulas, or processes developed over a period of more than 12 months; and

(4) income which is includible in the taxable year rather than another year by reason of a change in the taxpayer's method of accounting; or

(5) income of other classes permitted under regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

The bill also contains a number of other provisions designed to adjust the excess profits net income of specific classes of taxpayers.

(b) Installment basis taxpayers: The bill permits taxpayers using the installment-basis method of accounting for income-tax purposes to elect to report their income on an accrual basis for the excess-profits tax. This election is available to taxpayers whose principal business consists of installment sales or the purchasing of installment-sales obligations. Such an election when made is irrevocable and applies to all subsequent taxable years to which the excess-profits tax is applicable.

(c) Long-term contracts: A similar election is provided for taxpayers who receive payments under long-term contracts and who, under the completed contract method, account for such receipts as income for the year in which the contract is completed. The bill permits such taxpayers to elect to report their income from long-term contracts under the percentage of completion method of accounting for the purpose of the excess-profits tax. This election when made is also irrevocable and applies to subsequent taxable years.

(d) Long-term leases: A special adjustment is provided in the case of long-term leases which require the lessee to pay a stated rental to the lessor free of tax. Under such leases an increase in taxes automatically raises the income before taxes of the lessor corporation and may serve as the basis for the imposition of an excess-profits tax, which the lessee will be obligated to assume. The bill provides that in appropriate cases the amount of income or excess-profits tax paid by the lessee is excluded from the income of the lessor corporation, and that no deduction is allowed to the lessee. This treatment is available only in the case of a lease for a term of more than 20 years. However, an agreement for the lease of railroad properties is considered to be a lease for the total number of years during which the lease may be renewed or continued.

To qualify for such treatment it is necessary that the initial lease be entered into prior to December 1, 1950.

(e) Bad debt reserves of banks: Banks which have elected to use the reserve method of accounting for bad debts for income tax purposes will substitute for excess-profits tax purposes a deduction for debts which became worthless in whole or in part within the taxable year.

(f) Blocked income: Special rules are provided under the bill for the treatment of "blocked income" arising prior to 1951. These rules are discussed in paragraph 16 (f) below.

8. EXCESS-PROFITS NET INCOME IN THE BASE PERIOD

Many of the provisions in the bill for removing abnormalities from the income of the base period years are similar to those u ed in the taxable years. Among these are the exclusion of gains and losses from the sale or exchange of both long- and short-term capital assets, and income arising from the retirement or repurchase at less than the issue price of bonds and other evidences of indebtedness outstanding for more than 6 months.

However, net gains and losses from the sale or exchange of assets used in the trade or business (sec. 117 (j) assets) are excluded from the taxpayer's base period excess profits net income even though, when such losses exceed such gains, the excess is not excluded from the determination of income in the excess-profits tax years.

Deductions for premiums paid and expenses involved in the retirement of bonds and other evidences of indebtedness outstanding for more than 6 months are eliminated from the income of the base period years as from the income of the taxable year. Provision is made for the elimination of the deduction based on the repayment of processing taxes to vendees, which parallels the adjustment for processing tax refunds in the income of the excess-profits tax year.

A 100-percent credit for dividends received is allowed in computing the net income of the base period year and the rule applied to dividends in kind is the same as that now used under the corporate normal tax and surtax.

In addition, the bill contains a general provision applying to claims, awards, and judgments against the taxpayer, intangible drilling and development costs of oil or gas wells, development costs in the case of mines, casualty losses, and deductions of other classes subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary. Generally for any class of such abnormal deductions, the amount in excess of 115 percent of the average amount of deductions of such class for the four previous taxable years is to be eliminated under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, provided that in the base period year the deductions of the class disallowed exceed 5 percent of the average excess profits net income for all the taxpayer's base period years computed without the disallowance of any class of deduction under this provision. For the purposes of the latter limitation, a deficit in any of these years is counted as zero. An exception is made in the bill which excludes from the scope of the 115-percent limitation described above deductions in prior years arising out of the same extraordinary event which accounted for the deduction in the taxable year. The World War II law eliminated only the excess over 125 percent of the average of the deductions for the four previous taxable years, and did not include the 5-percent limitation described above.

The bill does not permit the disallowance of abnormal deductions unless the taxpayer establishes that the increase in the deduction is not (a) a cause or a consequence of either (1) an increase in the taxpayer's gross income in its base period or (2) a decrease in the amount of some other deduction in its base period, which increase or decrease is substantial in relation to the amount of the increase in the deductions of such class, or (b) a consequence of a change at any time in the type, manner of operation, size, or condition of the business engaged in by the taxpayer.

The bill follows the precedent of the World War II law in limiting the amount of the deductions disallowed to the excess over the deductions of the same class in the taxpayer's excess profits tax year.

The income of the base-period years is adjusted to conform to that of the taxable years in the case of taxpayers who elect to change from the installment basis to the accrual method of accounting, or to substitute the percentage of completion method for the completed contract method of accounting for payments under long-term contracts. The base-period income of lessees which are obligated to pay the tax due on the payment to a lessor under a long-term contract is adjusted in the base period to conform with the tax period. Banks using the reserve method of accounting for bad debts during the base period substitute deductions for debts which became worthless in whole or in part within those years for the larger deductions made to establish such reserves.

Life insurance companies deduct their contributions to policyholder's reserves in computing their base period excess-profits net income as in computing the income of their excess-profits tax years.

Banks are permitted to reduce their deductions for assessments paid to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation during the base-period years proportionately with the reductions which occur in the taxable year as a result of the credits allowed under Public Law 797 of the Eighty-first Congress, second session.

9. GENERAL RELIEF PROVISIONS

The bill provides relief in most of the important cases which were covered under section 722, the general relief provision of the World War II law. However, under section 722 a hypothetical base-period earnings credit had to be "tailor-made" for the individual taxpayer on the basis of almost all the factors which influenced the taxpayer's business during its base-period years. Hence a great deal of judgment was necessarily involved in the processing of the relief claims arising under section 722. The bill provides relief by a set of formulas, thus reducing the area of administrative discretion to a minimum.

(a) Abnormalities during the base period: Section 722 (b) (1) and (2) of the World War II law provided relief when the income of the taxpayer's base period years was substantially abnormal because of a physical interruption to production, such as a fire, strike, or flood, or because of a depression in the business of the taxpayer resulting from temporary economic circumstances unusual in the case of the taxpayer, such as a severe price war. The bill contains two formulas which provide relief in these same areas.

If an abnormality existed in the taxpayer's lowest year of earnings during the base period, this year will be eliminated automatically from the average base period net income computation. However, if an abnormality occurred in one of the remaining periods of 12 months or less in the base period, the taxpayer may, if it was in business at the beginning of its base period, substitute for its actual excess profits net income for the period of the abnormality an amount determined by multiplying its total assets for the last day of the period of the abnormality by the rate of return for its industry for that period.

If an abnormality is present in more than one of the three 12-month periods in the taxpayer's base period, a different formula is used. In such cases, a substitute average base period net income is computed by multiplying the average of the amounts of the taxpayer's total assets on the last day of each of its base period years by the base period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry.

The substitute average base period net income described above is available only if the taxpayer's average base period net income in the event of the substitution exceeds 110 percent of the taxpayer's average base period net income computed without adjustment for the abnormality. Similarly, a substitute excess profits net income may be used for a single abnormal year only if it exceeds 110 percent of the taxpayer's excess profits net income for that year computed without such substitution.

Taxpayers having abnormalities in more than one of their best 3 years may not adjust their substitute average base period net income for changes in capital during the last 2 years of the base period, since their substitute income is not dependent primarily upon their own earnings record. However, the taxpayer which has only one abnormal year, after eliminating its worst year, and, therefore, uses an average base period net income computed largely from its own earnings record, may claim the adjustment for capital additions in both 1948 and 1949, provided the year of the abnormality is 1946 or 1947, and may claim an adjustment for capital additions in 1949 where the year of the abnormality is 1948.

The industry rates of return used under this and other provisions of the bill will be determined and proclaimed by the Secretary of the Treasury. For this purpose the Nation's industry will be grouped into the classes shown in appendix A. This is a slightly modified version of a classification developed by the Bureau of the Budget for general use in the Federal Government, and the description of the classes appears in the Standard Industrial Classification Manual prepared by the Bureau's Division of Statistical Standards.

The computation of industry rates of return will be based on data regularly compiled from income-tax returns by the Treasury Department in preparing the statistics of income.

The industry rate of return for an individual year will be computed by dividing the sum of the aggregate net income and the aggregate interest deduction shown on the income-tax returns filed by the corporations in the industry by the aggregate total assets of such corporations as of the close of the taxable year for which the returns were filed. Since interest is added to net income in the calculation of the rate of return which the taxpayer applies to his assets, the amount of interest accrued by the taxpayer during a single year of abnormality is subtracted in determining his substituted income of that year. A similar adjustment is made in other cases where the industry rate of return for a single year is applied.

The industry base period rates of return will be computed by aggregating the net income and the interest deductions reported by the corporations in the industry during the 4-year period 1946 through 1949 and dividing by the aggregate of the sum of the total assets of these corporations for the 4 years in question. In this and other cases where the taxpayer computes a substitute average base period net income with its industry average base period rate of return the taxpayer makes an appropriate adjustment to eliminate 1 year's interest.

Since it will not be possible to assemble immediately the data necessary for computing the final rates of return for the last year or years in the base period, or for the entire base period, provision is made in the bill for the calculation of tentative rates of return. These are to be proclaimed prior to March 1, 1951, and will be used until the final rates have been proclaimed. The final rates will, of course, supersede the tentative rates and applications for adjustments based on the latter will be redetermined when the final rates are available.

The taxpayer adjusting only one of his three best years will use the rate of return for the industry to which is attributable the largest amount of its gross receipts in that year. The taxpayer using the industry rate of return for the entire base period will use the rate for the industry accounting for the largest amount of the taxpayer's gross receipts in the period.

Fiscal year taxpayers adjusting a taxable year beginning in 1945 and ending in 1946 will use the rate of return for the taxpayer's industry classification for the calendar year 1946. Those adjusting a taxable year beginning in 1949 and ending in 1950 will use the rate of return for the calendar year 1949. In other cases fiscal year taxpayers will use the index for the calendar year in which falls the greater number of days in such taxable year.

Since the rates of return are computed on the basis of total assets, the taxpayer using such rates will apply them to its total assets; that is, the sum of the cash and property other than cash or inadmissible assets used by the taxpayer for a bona fide business purpose. Such property is to be valued at its adjusted basis for determining gain on sale or exchange except that in the case of certain intangible property the basis shall be determined without reference to the value on March 1, 1913.

The taxpayer desiring to adjust its base period net income under these provisions will make an application with its return, or file a claim for refund within the period of limitations applicable to claims for refund, or file an application to offset a deficiency proposed against it. If a taxpayer files a petition with the Tax Court for redetermination of a deficiency, such application must be filed not later than the date of the filing of the original petition.

The definitions of total assets, gross receipts, industry classification, and base period rate of return described above are generally similar to those used under the formulas developed for most of the other hardship cases. The taxpayer's claim for adjustment in such cases will be made in the same manner and will be subject to the same special rule concerning the statute of limitations which applies when an adjustment is made for abnormal years.

(b) New products or services introduced during the base period: Corporations which commenced business before the base period and made substantial changes in their products or services during the last 36 months of the base period may elect a substitute average base period net income. This provision is the counterpart of the new-products adjustment authorized under section 722 (b) (4) of the World War II law. Corporations which commenced business after the beginning of the base period are not eligible under this provision, but may qualify for a substitute average base period net income under the new-corporation rule described below.

To qualify for relief under the "new product" provision the change in products or services must have been "substantial" in the sense that by the end of the third year (or earlier) following the year in which the products or services were introduced, the gross income from such products must aggregate to more than 40 percent of the taxpayer's gross income or 33 percent of the taxpayer's net income in that year. The taxpayer must also demonstrate that its net income in any one of the taxable years in which it has met the percentage of gross or net income test was in excess of 125 percent of the average excess profits net income during the base period year or years preceding the first change in product or service used in qualifying under the gross or net income test.

The taxpayer who qualifies prior to January 1, 1950, may use a substitute average base period net income computed by multiplying its total assets for the last day of its last pre-excess profits tax year or of the earliest year in which the taxpayer qualifies for relief, whichever day is later, by the base period rate of return in its industry. If the year in which the taxpayer first meets the aforementioned tests ends after the base period, the substitute average base period net income is computed by multiplying the total assets for the last day of such taxable year by the base period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry classification.

A taxpayer who obtains relief under the new product provision may obtain an adjustment for new capital additions in the tax period in those years which follow the year in which the taxpayer qualifies for relief under the new product provision. It is given no adjustment for capital additions in the base period.

Where a taxpayer establishes that it has made several substantial changes in products or services during the last 36 months of its base period, the aggregate effect of such changes is to be considered in determining whether the eligibility requirements of the section are met. The various income tests can be met in a particular year by considering all substantial changes made during the three preceding years.

(c) Increase in capacity during the base period: A corporation which commenced business before its base period and made substantial changes in its capacity during the last 36 months of the base period may also elect a substitute average base period net income. This provision is the counterpart of a portion of section 722 (b) (4) of the World War II law.

To qualify for relief under the "change in capacity" formula the taxpayer must have added to its facilities in a manner which—

(1) resulted in an increase of 100 percent or more in its productive capacity; or

(2) resulted in an increase of 50 percent or more in its productive capacity and the adjusted basis of the taxpayer's total facilities after the addition or replacement exceeds by 50 percent or more the adjusted basis of the taxpayer's total facilities prior to such addition or replacement; or

(3) the unadjusted basis of the taxpayer's total facilities after such addition or replacement exceeded by 100 percent or more the unadjusted basis of the taxpayer's total facilities prior to such addition or replacement.

These tests must be complied with prior to the end of the taxpayer's base period.

For the purpose of these tests the term "facilities" means real property and tangible depreciable property held by the taxpayer for a bona fide business purpose.

Taxpayers which qualify under one of the afore-mentioned tests may elect to use an average base period net income calculated by multiplying the base-period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry classification by the taxpayer's total assets for the last day in its last pre-excess-profits tax year. Since the alternative net income is computed on the basis of the assets as of the close of the base period, no adjustment is made for capital additions during the base period.

(d) Depressed industries: The bill provides a substitute average base period net income in cases where the taxpayer's industry was depressed during the base period. The World War II law contained section 722 (b) (3) (A), which permitted the reconstruction of a hypothetical base-period income when the taxpayer could show that the industry of which it was a part was depressed during the base period. Relief was available only when the depression was characteristic of the entire industry to which the taxpayer belonged, and this is also true of the provision contained in this bill.

The existence of a depression in the taxpayer's industry during the base period is to be determined by comparing the industry's average rate of return during the years 1946 though 1948 with its average rate of return during the period 1938 through 1948. Under the bill a depressed industry is one in which the industry average rate of return on total assets during the years 1946 through 1948 is less than 63 percent of its average rate of return over the period 1938 through 1948.

Taxpayers in depressed industries are permitted to use a substitute average base period net income computed by multiplying their average total assets during the base period by 80 percent of the depressed industry's average rate of return during the period 1938 through 1948.

For purposes of the depressed industry test, taxpayers will be classified in general conformity to the three-digit classification of industries used by the Treasury Department in compiling its statistics of income data for the years 1938 through 1947, using such combinations of subgroups as the Secretary determines are necessary to provide reasonably comparable data over the period 1938 through 1948. This classification is substantially more detailed than that shown in appendix A which is used in other relief provisions contained in this bill. The taxpayer's industry subclassification will be the one from which it derives the majority of its gross receipts.

The depressed industry formula also provides relief for the type of case covered under 722 (b) (3) (B) of the World War II law. These are cases in which the industry is characterized by sporadic and intermittent periods of high profits and such profits fail to appear in the base period. Hence the industry rate of return in the base period years may be expected to fall well below its long-term average since the latter will probably include one or more of the high profit periods.

10. ALTERNATIVE BASIS FOR NEW CORPORATIONS

Unlike the World War II law, the present bill combines the relief treatment for new corporations which commenced business during the base period with those which commenced business subsequent to the base period. In both cases an alternative average base period net income is provided which will make it unnecessary for the taxpayer to reconstruct a hypothetical base period experience as he did under section 722 of the World War II law.

Except in the case of a new corporation which acquires the assets of an old corporation (dealt with in pt. II of the bill) and certain ineligible corporations, an alternative average base period net income is provided for a corporation which commenced business at any time after the beginning of its base period. The alternative is computed by applying the average base period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry classification to the amount of the taxpayer's total assets. If the taxpayer's first three taxable years ended in the base period, the industry rate of return is applied to the taxpayer's total assets on the last day of the year preceding its first excess-profits tax year. This alternative net income may then be adjusted for retained earnings or net capital additions or reductions subsequent to the close of the base period. When the taxpayer's first, second, or third taxable year ends after the base period, the credit is determined for each of these years by applying the industry average base period rate of return to the taxpayer's assets for each of such years. The credit for subsequent years is determined in a similar manner on the basis of the assets at the close of the taxpayer's third year. A new corporation receives an adjustment for capital additions in the tax period when made more than 3 years after it commences business.

The new corporation treatment is denied in certain cases where taxpayers might transfer assets between corporations in order to obtain the benefit of the industry average rate of return available to new corporations.

11. ALTERNATIVE BASIS FOR GROWING CORPORATIONS

The bill provides an alternative average base period net income for a corporation which commenced business before the beginning of its base period and experienced an unusually rapid growth during its base period. This alternative is not available to a corporation commencing business at a later date which may qualify for relief under the new corporation formula described above.

The alternative average base period net income for growing corporations is a substitute for the so-called growth formula used in the World War II law which permitted all taxpayers to calculate their base period credit by adding to the average income of the last half of the base period 50 percent of the difference between the average income of the first and second halves of the base period, subject to the limitation that the alternative credit could not exceed the net income of the highest taxable year in the base period. The use of the World War II growth formula in the present bill would have resulted in the widespread use of the income of the year 1948 as the sole basis for calculating the average base period net income.

There are two alternative sets of tests provided in this bill for establishing the existence of unusually rapid growth during the base period. One set of tests, designated here as "test A," permits a corporation to qualify if its total payroll for the last half of its base period is 130 percent or more of its total payroll for the first half of its base period, or alternatively if its gross receipts during the last half of its base period are 150 percent or more of its gross receipts for the first half of its base period. It is important to note that an alternative average base period net income is available to a taxpayer who qualifies under test A only if the taxpayer's total assets at the beginning of the base period are not more than $20,000,000. For the purpose of this test the assets of a group of corporations which are privileged to file a consolidated return are aggregated whether or not a consolidated return is actually filed.

A taxpayer may also qualify as a "growth" company if it meets test B, which requires compliance with all of the following:

(1) The taxpayer's net sales for the period January 1 through June 30, 1950, when multiplied by two are 150 percent or more of its average net sales in the calendar years 1946 and 1947.

(2) Forty percent or more of the taxpayer's net sales for the calendar year 1950 are attributable to a product or class of products not generally available to the general public prior to January 1, 1946. For this purpose a product or class of products includes articles of which the product or class of products is a principal component and articles which are themselves a component of such product or class of products.

(3) The taxpayer's net sales attributable to such product or class of products in the calendar year 1946 are 5 percent or less than such net sales in 1949.

A corporation which qualifies under test B may obtain an alternative average base period net income even if its total assets at the beginning of the base period are more than $20,000,000.

A calendar year corporation which qualifies under either test A or test B may compute an alternative average base period net income on the basis of—

(1) its income in the years 1948 and 1949;

(2) its income in the year 1949; or

(3) one-half of its income in 1949 and 40 percent of its income in 1950.

Corresponding provisions are made for the fiscal year taxpayers.

Still another alternative is available to certain taxpayers which qualify under test B and whose excess-profits-net income for 1949 was not more than 25 percent of their income for 1948. Such taxpayers, if using the calendar year, may compute their alternative average base period net income on the basis of one-half their income in 1948 and 40 percent of their income in 1950. Corresponding provisions are made for fiscal year taxpayers.

12. CARRY-OVERS OF NET OPERATING LOSS AND UNUSED EXCESS-PROFITS CREDIT

The bill permits the use of the net operating loss carry-back and carry-forward in calculating the net income of an excess-profits-tax year. With the exceptions discussed below the same rule is used as under the corporate normal tax and surtax; that is, the carry-back is limited to 1 year and amounts not so absorbed are carried forward until exhausted over a period of not more than 5 years. This compares with a carry-back of 2 years and a carry-forward of 2 years used under the World War II law after 1942. Thus the averaging period under the bill will be 7 years as compared with 5 years under the previous law.

The bill also permits a taxpayer, other than an invested capital taxpayer using the asset approach, to elect to carry forward to the years 1950 and 1951 the total of the operating losses in the base period reduced by the losses carried back to years prior to the base period and by the income of the base period years.

The net operating-loss carry-over or carry-back is not used for computing the excess-profits-tax net income of the base-period years.

Like the World War II law this bill provides for a carry-back and carry-forward of an unused excess-profits credit. The carry-back is for 1 year and the carry-forward for 5, thus producing the same 7-year averaging period as under the net operating-loss carry-over. The unused excess-profits-tax-credit adjustment under the World War II law was limited to a carry-back of 2 years and a carry-forward of 2 years which conformed to the net operating-loss carry-over provisions of that law.

For a taxable year beginning before July 1, 1950, and ending after June 30, 1950, the unused excess-profits credit is the same percentage of such credit, computed as if all of such year were subject to the excess-profits tax, which the number of days in the taxable year after June 30, 1950, bears to the total number of days in the year.

The bill provides that any unused portion of the $25,000 minimum credit shall not be counted for purposes of the unused excess-profits carry-over.

An unused excess-profits credit cannot be carried back from a period after a corporation has distributed substantially all of its assets.

13. MINIMUM CREDIT FOR CERTAIN REGULATED INDUSTRIES

The bill provides a minimum excess-profits-tax credit which is available to taxpayers in certain specified types of regulated industries. This credit is an alternative to the average earnings credit and the invested capital credit for such taxpayers and is not subject to the 15-percent reduction generally applied to the average earnings credit.

In general, this minimum credit consists of the corporate normal tax and surtax payable by the corporation for the taxable year in question plus 6 percent or 7 percent of the sum of the equity capital, retained earnings, and borrowed capital, less interest payable on the borrowed capital. Equity capital and retained earnings of the regulated industries availing themselves of this alternative credit are reduced by the so-called inadmissible assets. However, the normal tax and surtax under the bill are not reduced by inadmissible assets.

The 6-percent rate of return is available to regulated industries supplying the following types of services or products:

(1) Electric energy;

(2) Gas;

(3) Water;

(4) Sewage disposal;

(5) Transportation on an intrastate, suburban, municipal, or interurban electric railroad, trolley system, or bus system; or

(6) Transportation by trucks or busses; where the rates charged by such corporations are subject to regulation by a governmental body.

The 6-percent rate of return is also available to a regulated industry supplying the following types of services or products:

(1) Transportation of oil or other petroleum products (including shale oil) or gas by pipeline if the corporation is subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Power Commission;

(2) Transportation by railroads regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

(3) Transportation by water subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Maritime Board under the Intercoastal Shipping Act of 1933.

The 7-percent rate of return is available to regulated industries supplying the following types of services or products:

(1) Telephone and telegraph services where the rates charged are subject to regulation by a governmental body; or

(2) Air transportation subject to the jurisdiction of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

In the case of interstate trucking, busses, railroads, and the transportation of oil by pipeline, and in the case of air transportation and transportation by water the equity capital and retained earnings on which the rate of return is computed under this alternative credit are the same as those of an ordinary corporation determining the value of its assets under the "asset approach." In the case of all other regulated industries receiving the benefits of this provision where the corporate books of account are maintained in accordance with systems prescribed by a regulatory body or maintained in accordance with the uniform systems prescribed by the Federal Power Commission or the National Association of Railway and Utilities Commissioners, the equity capital and retained earnings are the sum of the average outstanding common and preferred capital stock accounts and the capital surplus and earned surplus accounts as shown on the corporation's books.

The use of this alternative credit, in addition to being limited to corporations supplying the types of services or products described above, is limited to corporations deriving 80 percent or more of their gross income from regulated sources. Where a public utility supplies services or products in one or more "interconnected and coordinated" systems, and where the regulation to which the corporation is subject in part of its operating territory in effect controls rates in the unregulated territory, and these rates are as favorable to the users in the unregulated territories as the rates in the regulated territory, the whole "interconnected and coordinated" system or systems are considered to be regulated.

Since only some of the members of an affiliated group eligible to file a consolidated return may be regulated companies to which the special alternative credit is available, the bill specifies how consolidated returns should be handled in such cases. The regulated companies which are eligible for the minimum credit may be split-off and a consolidated return may be filed for them as a group, but if all the members of such an affiliated group file a single consolidated return, none of the regulated companies involved may claim the special minimum credit.

14. EXEMPTION OF STRATEGIC MINERALS

An exemption is provided under your committee's bill for domestic corporations mining strategic minerals with respect to the income attributable to such mining in the United States.

Strategic minerals as used in this provision include antimony, chromite, manganese, nickel, platinum (including the platinum group metals), quicksilver, sheet mica, tantalum, tin, tungsten, vanadium, fluorspar, flake graphite, vermiculite, perlite, long-fiber asbestos in the form of amosite, chrysolite or crocidolite, beryl, cobalt, columbite, corundum, diamonds, kyanite (if equivalent in grade to Indian kyanite), molybdenum, monazite, quartz crystals, and uranium. In addition "strategic" minerals include any other minerals which the agency created to carry out the duties under section 303 (a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 certifies as being essential to the defense effort of the United States and as not being normally produced in appreciable quantities in the United States.

The World War II statute provided for the exemption of antimony, chromite, manganese, nickel, platinum, quicksilver, sheet mica, tantalum, tin, tungsten, fluorspar, flake graphite, vermiculite, and vanadium.

15. EXEMPT INCOME FROM CERTAIN MINING AND TIMBER OPERATIONS AND FROM NATURAL-GAS PROPERTIES

The bill continues the relief which was provided by section 735 of the World War II statute with respect to certain mineral mining, timber, and natural-gas properties. For this purpose the term "mineral" includes the following: Ores of the metals, coal, and such nonmetallic substances as abrasives, asbestos, asphaltum, barytes, borax, building stone, cement rock, clay, crushed stone, feldspar, fluorspar, fuller's earth, graphite, gravel, gypsum, limestone, magnesite, marl, mica, mineral pigments, peat, potash, precious stones, refractories, rock phosphate, salt, sand, shell, silica, slate, soapstone, soda, sulfur and talc. This list is the same as under the World War II provision with the exception that "shell" was not included in that provision. The relief under this provision is provided by exempting from excess-profits tax a certain portion of the current income from these properties. Generally this portion is determined by multiplying the normal unit profit during the normal period 1946 to June 30, 1950 (1936 to 1939 in the case of the World War II statute) by a specified proportion of current production in excess of normal output during the base period. The provision in the bill differs from the World War II version in that a taxpayer is given the option to aggregate his mining properties for this purpose.

In the case of coal and iron mines, timber properties, and natural-gas properties, a World War II provision determined the exempt portion by multiplying current excess production by one-half of the current net income per unit. Such a provision is contained in the bill but is extended to apply to all metal mines.

The World War II statute also contained a provision providing partial exemption for coal and iron mines and timber properties not in operation during the base period. One-sixth of the net income in the current taxable yen. of these properties was exempt from excess-profits tax. The corresponding provision in this bill differs in a number of respects. The exemption from excess-profits tax for properties coming under the provision is increased from one-sixth to one-third of the net income from such property. Natural gas and metal mining properties not in operation during the normal period (the taxable years included in the period January 1, 1946, to June 30, 1950) are given the benefits of this provision as also are metal mining properties in operation in the normal period but having an aggregate loss for this period.

The bill exempts from both income and excess-profits taxes amounts paid to the taxpayer by the United States or any of its agencies or instrumentalities for the encouragement of exploration, development, or the mining of critical and strategic minerals or metals.

16. FOREIGN CORPORATIONS AND INCOME FROM ABROAD

(a) Foreign corporations: The bill imposes an excess-profits tax on foreign corporations only if they are engaged in trade or business within the United States and the foreign corporations subject to excess-profits tax are taxable only on income derived from sources within the United States. If such corporations were engaged in trade or business within the United States during all of their taxable years in the base period, they are entitled to use either the average earnings credit or the invested capital credit. If they were not engaged in trade or business within the United States during the entire base period, they are entitled to use only the invested capital credit. In computing the average earnings credit for corporations eligible to use this credit, only income derived from sources within the United States is taken into consideration. In computing the invested capital credit only United States assets and liabilities are taken into consideration. Where the Secretary of the Treasury determines that these assets and liabilities cannot satisfactorily be segregated from the other assets and liabilities of the corporation, the equity capital and retained earnings of the corporation, for purposes of the excess-profits tax, are to be the same proportion of the total equity capital and retained earnings of the corporation as its net income derived from sources within the United States is of its total net income. Borrowed capital in such cases is also determined from the relationship of net income from sources within the United States to the total net income of the corporation. The treatment provided under the bill for foreign corporations is substantially the same as provided by the World War II statute.

(b) Corporations deriving most of their income from United States possessions: Domestic corporations to which section 251 of the Internal Revenue Code is applicable—that is, corporations deriving a large portion of their income from sources within the possessions of the United States—are subject to excess-profits tax on only so much of their income as is derived from sources within the United States. They are given the same treatment under the excess-profits tax as foreign corporations engaged in trade or business within the United States during a tax year but not all of their base period years. This is the same treatment accorded under the World War II law.

(c) Western Hemisphere trade and similar corporations: The World War II statute provided an exemption for Western Hemisphere trade and other domestic corporations where 95 percent or more of their income over the last 3 years was derived from sources outside the United States, and where 50 percent or more of their gross income was derived from the active conduct of a trade or business. The bill continues this exemption.

The bill amends the provision relating to the filing of consolidated returns to provide groups of affiliated corporations with the opportunity to make a new decision as to whether or not they desire to file a consolidated return with respect to taxable years ending after June 30, 1950. While this provision is not limited to affiliated groups including a Western Hemisphere trade corporation, its primary effect will be to give such groups an opportunity to file a separate return for their Western Hemisphere trade corporation, and thus receive an exemption from the excess-profits tax with respect to the income of such a corporation.

(d) Dividends received from foreign corporations: Under the World War II law, dividends received from foreign corporations by domestic corporations were included in the excess-profits tax net income of average-earnings taxpayers, both for the base period and the tax period. On the other hand, they were not included in the excess-profits net income of invested capital taxpayers in the tax period and the stock in the foreign corporation was excluded from invested capital. Under the bill foreign dividends are excluded from excess-profits net income in the tax period in the case of both the average earnings and the invested capital taxpayer. In addition, such dividends are excluded from the base-period income of the average-earnings taxpayer, and the stock in a foreign corporation is excluded from invested capital in the case of the taxpayer computing his tax in this manner.

(e) Foreign tax credit: Under the bill, as under the World War II statute, domestic corporations operating branches abroad are subject to excess-profits tax on the income derived from such branches in the year in which it is earned. However, any tax paid a foreign country with respect to such foreign operations which is in excess of the tax credit allowed by the United States for purposes of the normal tax and surtax is allowed as a credit against excess-profits tax subject to certain limitations. The tax treatment accorded branches is the same as that provided by the World War II statute.

(f) Blocked income: Taxpayers deriving income from sources within a foreign country are permitted under the bill to exclude such portion of the income as would, but for monetary, exchange, or other restrictions imposed by the foreign country, have been includible in the gross income of the taxpayer prior to its first excess-profits tax year.

The Secretary is directed to prescribe rules for a reasonable allocation of the blocked income which arose prior to the end of the base period in cases where specific identification cannot be made.

A special rule is provided for the reallocation of income which arose during the first excess-profits tax year but became "unblocked" in later years.

Deductions properly allocable to income which is excluded under this provision are not allowed.

17. EXEMPTION FOR CERTAIN AIR-MAIL SUBSIDIES

As under the World War II law, airlines may exclude air-mail subsidies paid by the Federal Government if the airlines have no adjusted excess-profits tax net income when these air-mail subsidies are not taken into consideration.

18. PERSONAL SERVICE CORPORATIONS

The World War II law provided that personal service corporations could elect to be exempted from the excess-profits tax if the stockholders of such corporations agreed to take up as part of their income for individual income-tax purposes the pro rata share of the undistributed profits of the personal service corporations. This did not, however, exempt a personal service corporation from the corporate normal tax or surtax. A personal service corporation was defined as a corporation whose income was to be ascribed primarily to the activities of shareholders who are regularly engaged in the active conduct of the affairs of the corporation and who are the owners of at least 70 percent of the stock of the corporation. The bill retains this provision of the World War II statute.

19. CORPORATIONS COMPLETING CONTRACTS UNDER THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT

Under section 505 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, if any contracting party in its taxable year completes one or more contracts or subcontracts for the construction of a vessel under this act, it is required to pay to the Maritime Board any profit in excess of 10 percent of the total contract prices of the contracts and subcontracts. These profits paid to the Maritime Board, together with all other receipts of the Board, are placed in a revolving construction fund and are available for further ship construction.

Under the bill the amount received by the contracting party and recaptured by the Maritime Board first will be excluded in computing the excess-profits tax. An alternative computation requires the taxpayers to increase their excess-profits net income by the amount of the payments to the Maritime Board. The tax computed upon this basis is then reduced by the amount of such payments, and the remainder constitutes the tax which is to be paid, if it is less than the tax computed under the first method.

20. SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO THE EXCESS-PROFITS-TAX CREDIT FOR RAILROAD CORPORATIONS

The bill provides that where substantially all of the properties of one railroad have been leased to another railroad prior to December 1, 1950, under a lease for more than 20 years, which requires the lessee railroad to pay the Federal income taxes of the lessor railroad, the excess-profits-tax credit may be equitably apportioned between the corporations pursuant to an agreement between the corporations which is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The same treatment is provided for leases which are automatically renewed and where the whole term, including the renewal period, exceeds 20 years. Where such leases have been first entered into prior to December 1, 1950, they are to be considered as having been entered into prior to such date even though renewed after such date. The benefits of this provision are also available where more than one lessee is involved.

The bill provides that the invested-capital credit of a railroad which was formerly a lessor shall include the fair value of betterments and additions made by a lessee railroad to property of the lessor railroad if the lease has been canceled.

21. RECOMPUTATION OF THE EARNINGS CREDIT IN THE CASE OF CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

In the case of certain corporate reorganizations during the base period or subsequent to the base period, the experience of the corporations prior to the reorganization may be aggregated for purposes of determining excess-profits credits based on earnings. This is provided for in part II of the excess-profits tax subchapter in this bill. The reorganizations dealt with in part II are the type with respect to which gain or loss is not recognized. In addition to the general type of case where substantially all the assets of one corporation are taken over by another corporation, part II provides rules for the recomputation of base period net income in the case where substantially all the assets of a partnership or a sole proprietorship are acquired by a corporation and in cases where only part of the assets of the partnership are placed in a corporation or where only part of the assets of the corporation are split off into a new corporation.

Part II also covers those corporate reorganizations under section 112 (g) (1) (D) which are commonly known as split-ups, where the assets of a corporation are split up among two or more new corporations followed by the liquidation of the corporation originally transferring the assets. The inclusion in the definition of this type of transaction in section 461 (a) of a reference to section 112 (b) (4) is sufficiently broad to cover this type of a case, as well as the case where the transferring corporation, following a transfer in a reorganization of only a part of its properties in exchange for the stock of the acquiring corporation, retains that stock as its own. The above definition excludes transfers of assets by a corporation which is exempt from income tax under section 101 of the code.

In general, if all the properties of the corporation are taken over by another corporation in an exchange to which part II is applicable, the old corporation is no longer entitled to use its business experience prior to the exchange for purposes of computing average base period net income. Instead, the corporation which acquires the properties may use the experience of the corporation which gave them up if this will result in a lower tax for the acquiring corporation. In a case where only part of the assets of a corporation go over to a new corporation in an exchange in which gain or loss is not recognized, the old corporation loses that portion of its base period experience which is allocable to the assets it loses in the exchange, and the acquiring corporation may utilize such experience in computing its average base period net income.

Where a corporation computes its excess-profits-tax credit simply on the basis of its excess-profits net income during the base period, the effect of part II is to provide that, after the corporation acquires assets in an exchange described in part II, it shall recompute its excess-profits net income for each month of the base period prior to the exchange by combining its own earnings experience during those months with the earnings experience of the corporation whose assets it acquired. If the corporation whose assets were acquired was not in existence during a month in the base period in which the acquiring corporation was in existence, then the recomputation described above is made for such month by combining the earnings of the acquiring corporations with 1 percent of the equity capital of the corporation whose assets were acquired (after adjustment for inadmissible assets).

In addition to providing rules for the recomputation of excess-profits net income for purposes of the earnings credit, part II also provides for the recomputation of excess-profits net income and the attribution of payroll, gross receipts, net sales, and total assets in the case of the alternative earnings credit based on growth. It provides rules for the recomputation of excess-profits net income and rules for the determination of average base period net income in the case of part II transactions involving corporations with base-period abnormalities. It also provides rules for the computation of average base-period net income in the case of part II transactions involving corporations which have had changes in the products or services furnished during the base period, corporations which have had increases in capacity for production or operation during the base period, new corporations, and corporations which were members of depressed industries during the base period.

A corporation which is created incident to a part II transaction is not denied the growth alternative by reason of being a new corporation.

In the case of the type of exchange described in part II in which the assets of one corporation are split among two corporations the base period earnings experience of the one corporation prior to the exchange is allocated among the corporations in business after the exchange in proportion to the fair market value of the assets of the old corporation which are held by each of the corporations after the exchange. The bill permits also the determination of the fair market value of the properties involved and the determination of the division of such value among the parties by agreement between the parties to the transaction with the Secretary's consent and permits in lieu of an allocation based on fair market value, an allocation based on the earnings experience of the assets transferred where the parties to the transaction agree to the allocation and it is established to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the allocation fairly represents an identifiable earnings experience of each group of assets transferred or retained. The allocation as among the component corporation and any acquiring corporations shall not exceed 100 percent of the excess-profits net income (or average base period net income) of the corporation whose assets are transferred except in the case where part of the assets of a partnership were transferred to an acquiring corporation or corporations in a part II exchange which occurred before December 1, 1950. In such a case the earnings experience of the assets transferred may be used in the determination of excess-profits net income by the acquiring corporation even though this earnings experience may represent an amount in excess of the net income of the partnership while it held the assets, if it is established to the satisfaction of the Secretary that such an allocation fairly represents an identifiable earnings experience of such transferred assets.

In order to prevent double counting of base period earnings experience in applying the recomputation rules provided by part II, the Secretary is authorized to issue regulations providing for reduction of the average base period net income of the taxpayer and adjustments of transferred capital additions and reductions to the extent necessary in cases where, in general, the taxpayer acquired stock in a component corporation for other than its own stock. This provision is carried over from the World War II law and serves to prevent a taxpayer using assets which have had a base period earnings experience in its hands from purchasing stock of a corporation holding other assets which have similarly had a base period earnings experience and subsequently acquiring that latter experience by reason of a part II transaction.

In the case of part II transactions on or before December 31, 1950, abnormal income received in the tax period which is attributable to a year of the component corporation during or prior to the base period is treated in the same manner as though the business of the component during such period has been the business of the acquiring corporation.

Adjustment is provided for both net capital additions during the last 2 years of the base period and net capital additions and reductions after the close of the base period in the case of parties to an exchange described in part II.

22. BASIS FOR COMPUTATION OF THE INVESTED-CAPITAL CREDIT AFTER INTERCORPORATE LIQUIDATIONS

Part III of the excess-profits-tax subchapter provides rules for the determination of the invested capital in the case of certain exchanges and liquidations. These rules correspond to those provided by supplement C of the World War II law.

VIOLATION OF UNITED STATES ESPIONAGE LAWS—DECODING OF TOP SECRET MESSAGES

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of the Armed Services Committee, the Justice Department, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to what would appear to be one of the greatest breaches of security that perhaps we have ever witnessed during wartime. I read a story in a local paper last Saturday which, if true—I repeat, which, if true—means that we have a man in the decoding room in the Pentagon who is guilty of high treason. If this story is true, it means that we have had a breach of security which endangers the lives of millions of American young men and which endangers the very life of this Nation. Before going into the facts, I should like to recite a bit of history.

One of the outstanding military men in Japan was Admiral Yamamoto. He it was who did much of the planning for Pearl Harbor, at which Japan from a standpoint of destruction of shipping won the greatest battle against a navy of all times.

It will be recalled that Yamamoto bragged that he would dictate the terms of the peace treaty from Washington. In the spring of 1943, Yamamoto was making a survey of what then appeared to be the impregnable Japanese chain of island defenses strung across the Pacific. As Yamamoto's very heavily escorted and guarded plane took off from the airfield at Kahili on April 7, 1943, a few American fighter planes dropped out of the clouds and headed directly for Yamamoto's plane. The American fighters were outnumbered more than 10 to 1. They did not waste any time on the Japanese fighters, but headed right through them and tore Yamamoto's plane to shreds and within a matter of seconds it exploded in the air. This was possible only because we knew exactly the time his plane was taking off, exactly the type of protection it would have, where it would be in the formation, and so forth.

Because of the brilliant planning of Yamamoto many Amercans had already died. Had this brilliant strategist lived, many American boys who are living today would be dead. Had he lived many Japanese who are dead today would undoubtedly be living.

At the time, of course, we could not notify the American people just how this brilliantly successful attack upon and destruction of Japan's most valuable military man could have been timed to the second. Since then, however, it has been made public knowledge that we had broken Japan's code and from radio messages picked up and decoded we could plot his trip all through the Pacific and decide the ideal time for his destruction.

The Senate will recall the Battle of Midway at which time we once and for all broke the back of Japan's seapower. Since then many papers and periodicals have carried the story, which, of course, could not be made public at the time, namely, that we had broken the Japanese code and that this breaking of the code contributed vastly to this great victory over the Japanese Navy, which marked perhaps more than anything else the turning point of the war.

Some of the unsung heroes of the war were the men who worked night and day in our decoding rooms. Those unsung heroes saved the lives of a vast number of American young men. To them should go substantial credit for the crippling of the Japanese Fleet at Midway and for destroying a substantial part of the brains of the Japanese military when Yamamoto's plane disintegrated over the Kahili airfield, and also for a great number of other American victories.

It isn't necessary to tell this Senate or the country how inconceivably painstaking, almost beyond words, is the job of breaking the enemy's code. The young men who work at this task are called cryptanalysts. One of the greatest helps that can be given them in finding the key to a code is possession of at least one of the enemy's messages, both encoded and decoded. If one of our cryptanalysts can be handed the same message in code and also decoded, a long and important step is taken toward breaking the enemy's code. For that reason the strictest possible rules of top secrecy are imposed upon the handling of any message which has been sent in code. Our military realizes that if even the most unimportant message which has been sent in code falls into the hands of the enemy after it has been decoded that may well break our code, which during wartime would undoubtedly result in military disaster as it did for the Japanese.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield for a question only.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to ask a question. Does the Senator recollect how the story of the breaking of the Japanese code was made known during World War II?

Mr. McCARTHY. I frankly do not. But I wish the Senator would allow me to finish. I think this is too important a story for us to go back and get into a discussion of the question of how it was made public. The fact is that we can safely talk about it now. It has been made public. It is public information now, that we were eminently successful because of having broken the Japanese code; and we all know now that many American boys are living today because we broke that code. We know that if the code had not been broken, thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of American boys would have died. I merely mention that to point out why it has been made such a grave crime to assist the enemy in breaking our code.

Now, as I say, if one of the young men who work in the decoding room, one of the unsung heroes, can get the enemy's message, both in code and decoded, he has then won a tremendous victory; he is then well on the road toward breaking the code.

In our entire area of combat operations only two officers were entrusted with the important task of encoding and decoding. If either of them had made a decoded message available to anyone except the commander to whom it was directed, he would have been subject to immediate court martial and the most severe penalty. In fact, I cannot think of any document which was guarded more carefully and destroyed more quickly when it had served its purpose than a decoded message.

Any man who would sneak from our decoding rooms at the Pentagon secret messages that have been decoded and then make those messages available to the enemy would be guilty of the most reprehensible moral and legal crime against the United States. Under our laws he would be guilty of treason.

In that connection I would like to call the Senate's attention to an article appearing in the local Daily Worker, the Washington Post, on December 30, 1950, an article written by the great smear artist and mouthpiece of Moscow, Drew Pearson. In it he gave the dates upon which top secret coded messages were sent from MacArthur's intelligence headquarters to the Pentagon. Then he gives what he claims to be the messages decoded and verbatim. For example he states:

> On December 6, just 2 days after MacArthur had announced his million-man Chinese army estimate, General Willoughby cabled as follows:
> "Units believed to be on Eighth Army front are, west to east: Elements Fiftieth CCF (Chinese Communist Field) Army; elements Sixty-sixth Chinese CCF Army; Thirty-ninth CCF Army; Fortieth CCF Army; Thirty-eighth CCF Army; Forty-second CCF Army."

Again he states:

> In mid-December, General Willoughby cabled the following description of Chinese arms equipment: "Battalion CCF Army with three grenades and rifle or Russian submachine gun per man and 300 North Korean Army stragglers crossed Taedong."

And again he says:

> Another of Willoughby's intelligence cables to Washington about mid-December is interesting: "Lack of CCF on Eighth Army front. Due to deep withdrawal executed by Eighth Army, it is evident that enemy, lacking any great degree of mobility, has been unable to regain contact."

And another quote:

> Another of General Willoughby's reports at about the same time, states: "Those well-versed in Chinese military operations stress an inherent lack of elasticity in planning and similar inelasticity in staff and command structure. Such deficiencies can only result in stereotyped campaigns, and hold offensive action to slow succession of limited objectives.
> "It follows, then," continued General Willoughby, "that CCF high command, being unable to predict degree of success for his initial offensive of November 28, was confronted by the problem of immediately realining his forces for the continuation of the offensive; or of continuing to objectives according to their set schedule."

If Pearson is telling the truth and correctly quoted top secret messages which go from General MacArthur's headquarters to the Pentagon, he is rendering the enemy a service of untold value and is endangering the lives of every American boy either in our Armed Forces or about to be drafted. If he is telling the truth, it means that someone in the Pentagon is stealing top secret messages and passing them to the enemy and is thereby guilty of high treason.

This is a matter which should receive the immediate attention, not only of the Army but of the Armed Services Committees of both Houses and of the Justice Department. This Congress cannot stand idly by and allow a traitor access to the files in the decoding room in the Pentagon.

One of two things is true—either this man is telling the truth, and I should hate to have to accuse him of that—either he is telling the truth, in which case it means that we have in our decoding room a man guilty of high treason, a man who should be court martialed instanter and be subjected, of course, to the most severe penalties which are provided; or, if he is lying—if again this is the work, I may say the typical work, of a degenerate liar, then that also must be exposed, because by printing the alleged verbatim intelligence reports in this attempt to destroy a great intelligence officer, General Willoughby, he is attempting to sap and destroy the morale of our Army, which, again, during wartime, certainly approaches treason.

I would like also to call attention to another aspect of this article. Let me quote again from the local Daily Worker, the Washington Post:

> If all these six Chinese armies were of full strength with no casualties—which is doubtful—the total Chinese force which sent the UN Eighth Army, into a 120-miles retreat in less than 2 weeks was only 96,000 men.

This is, of course, a deliberate falsehood, one which can easily be detected by any man who knows the first thing about the organization of an army, but the type of falsehood which can greatly disturb the American wives and mothers who are not expected to understand the make-up of an army. Pearson, who has known not one hour of war, claims, however, to be a military expert. Therefore, he should know that the "type" army contains 3 corps and that each corps contains 3 divisions; that a division contains 15,000 to 18,000 men. In other words, an army would contain from 135,000 to 162,000 men, which would mean that 6 armies would run close to a million men, rather than 96,000. There is, of course, considerable indication that when the Chinese refer to an army they actually are referring to an oversize corps. Pearson, however, sets a Chinese army at 16,000, which is less than the size of an American division, which even a private in the Army can tell you is ridiculous to the point of being ludicrous.

The purpose of this lie is obvious as you read the article. It is to create the impression that actually our young men outnumber the Chinese and that, therefore, there is something wrong with our fighting forces, or they would not be retreating before inferior numbers of Chinese.

This is a part of the Communist Party line attack upon General MacArthur. General MacArthur must be destroyed if international communism is to win out in Asia. They know that MacArthur must be destroyed before they can create a Red Pacific—hence this deliberate, degenerate type of lying.

Now I assume that this additional exposure of this man, who claims to be working with someone who is stealing American secrets from the decoding room at the Pentagon—a man who is then making those secret messages available verbatim to the enemy so they may break our code—I assume this exposure will be referred to by some of the bleeding hearts of the radical wing of the press as interfering with freedom of the press.

It is high time that the American people distinguish between freedom of the press and license to poison and pollute the waterholes of information at which 152,000,000 American people drink. It is time to quit confusing freedom of the press with prostitution of the press.

Freedom of the press never did carry the right to bring into the readers' homes the mouthings of an exposed, degenerate liar. Two weeks ago, I quoted to the Senate the highest type of witnesses we could find who had exposed this man as a deliberate liar on 45 different occasions. Those witnesses ranged all the way from two Presidents to outstanding men in the Senate and House from both sides of the aisle.

Does it interfere with freedom of the press to call the attention of the publishers and editors throughout the country to the fact that when they carry this man in their papers, they are in effect stamping with approval deliberate lies.

To my good friends who say "we must present both sides of the question," I say, 'Yes, both sides of the question, but that does not involve presenting lies and serving them up as the truth."

Freedom of the press, perhaps, is the greatest bulwark in a democracy. I certainly hope we have freedom of the press in this Nation for all times to come.

The quickest way to lose that freedom of the press is to prostitute it. The best way for editors and publishers to endanger that freedom of the press is to carry in their columns the work of an exposed, known, deliberate liar. The 45 Senators and Congressmen and the 2 Presidents who went out of their way to expose that liar, so that editors and publishers would know what they were buying, have actually rendered a great service toward assuring freedom of the press. Removing deliberate, degenerate liars from the news columns does not endanger freedom of the press, it protects it.

Mr. President, I wish to say something else now for Mr. Pearson's benefit.

The other day he sent a man to me to ask me not to use certain photostats which somehow he found I had in my files. He explained why he did not want them used.

I desire to assure him that he is wasting his time sending anyone to me, that if I do not use those photostats, it is only because I refuse to sink to his level in exposing to the American people exactly what type of man this individual is. I intend to continue to expose him, to continue to show he is the mouthpiece of Moscow. I intend to continue showing what a great danger he is to freedom of the press. But I tell him here and now that if he sends another man to my office, either with threats or promises in regard to the use of those photostats, then on the next day those photostats will all be presented to the Senate.

SUSTAINED VIGIL THE PRICE OF SECURITY—EXCERPTS FROM STATEMENT BY GENERAL MARSHALL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think it is particularly important that the articles I am about to ask to have inserted in the RECORD be printed in the RECORD today, in view of the address made by the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], because I feel that these two articles call attention to another and somewhat different emphasis on the great foreign policy problem which confronts us.

Therefore, I first ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, very short excerpts from a great statement by the Secretary of Defense, Gen. George C. Marshall, entitled "Sustained Vigil the Price of Security."

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUSTAINED VIGIL THE PRICE OF SECURITY

I think probably the best way for me to start is to explain that we are in a very difficult situation, militarily. There are worldwide hazards because we have had no basis of preparation for a partial mobilization.

Heretofore, in our history we have been either on a peace basis—however weak that was—or on a full-mobilization basis.

When we go to full mobilization, which is a terrific undertaking in so many respects, it is necessarily somewhat wasteful and very disturbing to the whole public. Yet, when we go into that, we all go together and, in one respect, it is a rather simple procedure because it is all-out everywhere.

How long we can maintain that all-out state is something else in relation to the public reactions, which I'll refer to later.

When we are on peacetime status, you of course are familiar with our difficulties in procuring the necessary funds, the struggles we have, the criticisms of military expenses in this field or in that field, and things of that nature.

A CRITICAL SITUATION

Now, today, we are confronted by a situation—very, very critical and of an increasingly critical nature. We could meet it by all-out mobilization, which would be a relatively simple adjustment for the Department of Defense, but I think it would be too precipitate to take that line of action.

I feel that we should develop a workable system of partial mobilization from which we can move with great rapidity into a full mobilization.

The degree of partial mobilization is something else. It becomes a matter of degree, once we can set the base and get the laws rearranged and take other steps that will permit us to do this.

The background of all this is the fact that our whole military system or posture is based on a citizen army. We have a National Guard of 27 divisions and some 20 combat teams.

We have a considerable number of Reserves, of individuals, as officers, and then we have the necessity of bringing into the Armed Forces by means of the Selective Service Act, whatever its terms are at the time, the necessary men to fill these units up, to keep them filled after you once get them going, and to organize all new units. That is a long, time-consuming process, but the basis of all our procedure has been a citizen army.

A PROBLEM FOR LEGISLATORS

At the present time in considering any degree of a partial mobilization, we find the laws are not adapted to that purpose, I am not criticizing Congress. I am not criticizing the public. I am not criticizing the Pentagon. Nobody had quite the vision to see that we were going to be faced with a period of long tension requiring partial mobilization.

How long will the American public carry themselves through this tension, making the necessary contributions and sacrifices to maintain what we feel is a necessary military set-up, both as to individuals and as to matériel? Well, when it comes to that, I find differences of opinion.

I can best explain one of them by a conversation that took place shortly after I came into the building here.

In that conversation, a high official said, "Do you consider that I am naive to say that the American public has learned its lesson?" We were disagreeing as to what had to be done. I will come to that later when I am talking about an enduring system. And I said, "I don't think you are naive. I just think you are incredibly naive, because when you come to this tension and it becomes a monotonous tension without all of the excitement that keeps booming up such tensions, the bottom will drop out, unless we have completely changed."

I have gone through, personally, some very destructive periods. Maybe I have been bumped too often and am not a good guide, but I saw the destruction of 1920, when General Pershing, with all his prestige, was utterly unable to do anything to save even the remnants of what we call a ground force.

Then we came to another example in August 1941, when the insistent demand all over the country was for the return of the National Guard men to their homes, the return of the selective-service men to their homes. Had we complied, we would have had nothing left.

In August 1941, in the middle of a world war with all Europe under the Nazis and with this situation in the army that I have described, we saved that army from complete, utter, entire disintegration by one vote in Congress.

So when I say that it was incredibly naive to believe that America has learned its lesson I relate my own lesson, but I had a graduation exercise, too.

When I came in as deputy chief of staff and later as chief of staff, we had 15 flying fortresses without enough money to maintain them or enough gasoline to do the appropriate flying. In my last week as chief of staff here, in the fall of 1945, I signed the agreement for the destruction of 2,700 of these fortresses. That is a considerable bracket—from 15 and not enough money for them, to the destruction of 2,700 of them for very evident, logical reasons.

A TIDAL WAVE

And then the great demobilization was on with which you are all familiar. I am more familiar with the pressure to produce that demobilization than you are, because I had to go before Congress twice to try to save this situation in some way. It was a tidal wave for demobilization.

Now we are confronted at the very best with a period of long tension, we hope—we hope.

Now, the point I want to make here hastily is that for the first time, in Korea, we had to fight the first week. We would have fought the first day if it had not been that we had to wait until we had a United Nations front, which was of such vast importance. You will hear more about that in detail this morning, but we had to fight the first week, and I would like to tell you what we had to fight with. I was not in the Department then, so I can be quite impersonal about this. I did not come in until well after the liberation of Seoul and the landing on Inchon.

We had four divisions in Japan when the dikes broke out and they were all pitifully under strength. We had about three divisions in this country. Only one of them was up to 60 or 70 percent of strength.

They were outnumbered about 200 to 1 at the start.

We had a situation in Korea of putting men with 3 weeks' training who did not speak our language in the middle of our units and that course of action enabled them to go ahead and function, but, of course, they get tired, get worn down, and suffer very constant casualties. The problem is to keep these units up to strength.

I have just given you the items of our own deficiencies of our own soldiers at the present time. You cannot get soldiers in a minute. It is not a question of "springing to arms overnight," as Mr. Bryan once said. It is a long, tedious process, and you have to have a system.

You have to have a method or you are sunk, especially if we get into any large affair. We got out of this one by a miracle as far as we have gotten out.

It has been a desperate procedure from start to finish because, for the first time—for the first time—we had to fight the first week, and we know that if there's a second time, it will be the first day.

Now, what seems to me so important—and this gets into the whole procedure of material procurement which interests the industrialists and interests labor—is that we do not pick up an emotional wave, just build a mountain and then slide right off into a valley again.

MENACE OF PUBLIC BOREDOM

We have got to figure out how long the people will be able to carry the load. Of what nature must it be in order for the American public to carry it along? We must have an enduring system.

There is a complete unanimity about that. We have got to build up now as rapidly as we can. But we have got to have a system in doing so.

We just must not fall of our own weight with the boredom of the public to a prolonged tension into another catastrophic state of great weakness, which in the present state of the world would be terrible.

What is an enduring system that will endure through these various fluctuations and through this evident period of long tension that is in front of us? If we are thrown under the necessity of full mobilization in one respect, terrible as it is, we can meet it but we have to have an enduring system, one that can be taken and carried on without a collapse of public support.

We have got to get matériel quickly, right now and build up a certain peak—but in such a way that we do not get to the top and then fall to the bottom. Everybody wants some security in the continuity of the procedure. We are more interested in such continuity even than the industrialists and even labor. We have got to get—I keep repeating that word—an "enduring" system.

We have another aspect in addition to the partial mobilization and the enduring system of defense which requires great understanding on the part of all the leading citizens in this country that you will hear about in detail later. That is the United Nations.

UNDERSTANDING AS THE KEY

Now we are in a situation where it is paramount, as I see it and my associates see it, that we have a common front among many nations, if there is any conceivable way to find it, because we must not be alone in the world. We must have allies with us, and they have a world of different ideas, a world of different confidence.

As to matériel, we have got to procure great quantities of matériel and get them quickly, as rapidly as we can, for ourselves, Western Europe and ourselves, and others, particularly for Western Europe and ourselves.

Now, there are ways of doing that. We can just pile it up, you might say, and get into the numbers racket, which is what we were pressed with all the time in 1939 and 1940. What we do want is a basis of rapid increase of production.

I will express it in simpler terms this way—it is far better for us to begin at once with existing assembly lines on a 40-hour week, an 8-hour day, and double or treble the shifts to get production going rather than wait for the construction of new lines which in their stride could increase the flow of munitions 600 percent.

We have got to maintain a solid front. Understanding is the most important aspect of the problem. If I have made two points clear to you—the question of the complications involved in partial mobilization and the necessity of an enduring procedure—why, then I have discharged my functions so far as this particular meeting is concerned.

THE STATE OF EUROPE—THE WEST'S STRENGTH — ARTICLE BY ROSCOE DRUMMOND

Mr. MORSE. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "The State of Europe—The West's Strength," written by Roscoe Drummond, and published in a recent issue of the Christian Science Monitor.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATE OF EUROPE—THE WEST'S STRENGTH

(By Roscoe Drummond)

PARIS.—Readers of these dispatches are fully aware that Western Europe is today perilously exposed to aggression because it is militarily unprepared to defend itself.

It is only by facing this fact, not trying to conceal it—since it is clearly visible to Moscow—that the decisions essential to speed military preparedness will be taken—as they are at last beginning to be taken right now.

But what also needs to be realized is that Western Europe is not intrinsically weak and impotent; that is the lie which the Kremlin seeks to impose upon the minds of the people of these nations and to insinuate into the thinking of the American people.

The truth is that Western Europe is intrinsically strong and powerful; it is economically strong and industrially powerful.

The combined economic and industrial potential of the west is vastly greater than that of the Soviet Union and all its satellites together.

At a time when Moscow is trying to panic the west in order to prevent the free nations from mobilizing the power which is in their hands, it is well to look at some of the facts on the side of the free world.

The United States, Western Europe, and their associate countries now produce—

More than four times as much steel and pig iron as Russia and all its satellites;

More than five time as much electric power as Russia and all its satellites;

Ten times as much petroleum;

Three times as much coal;

Eight times as much wool, rayon, and cotton;

Three times as much wheat;

Four times as much livestock as Russia and all its satellites.

That is what the west is doing now, and the west has only begun to go to work.

We know that in the past, as today, the free nations are exposed to aggression when their gigantic resources are largely unmobilized and when the aggressor has been almost totally mobilized. Russia is the only great power which did not demobilize after World War II; it kept its army and air force on a war footing.

But the balance of economic strength and industrial capacity—and therefore the balance of military potential—is with the west. The west is strong materially as well as morally when it gears its capacity to defense.

This will not be accomplished overnight; there are grave dangers in the coming months, but there is no reason in faith or in fact why the free world should be intimidated by Moscow into partial or complete inaction. The pattern of totalitarian imperialism, whether Nazi or Communist, is clear. The totalitarian aggressor attacks—

When the free nations are confused and divided within;

When the free nations are weak and unprepared;

When the free nations are alone and divided from one another.

These are the conditions which the Communists have sought to bring about in Western Europe since the end of the war. These are the conditions which Western Europe, with the aid of the Marshall plan and with the military assistance of the United States through the North Atlantic Treaty, has been slowly but steadily correcting—in awareness that the aggressor shrinks from attacking—

When the free nations have the will and determination to resist;

When the free nations are strong and prepared;

When the free nations are united—within themselves and with each other—for the common defense.

No counsel is more applicable to the problems the free nations face today than the theme of Wendell Willkie's 1940 Presidential campaign, uttered at a time when the west was only a little less in peril than it is at this moment:

"Only the productive can be strong and only the strong can be free."

The United States and its allies possess the material, military, and spiritual resources needed for their survival, but if they are not put fully to use now there is no foreseeing the outcome.

COMMITTEE ORGANIZATION

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I am about to move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. About what day does the Senator think the Senate will be ready for organization in respect to its committees?

Mr. McFARLAND. When will the minority be ready to submit its committee list?

Mr. WHERRY. I think both sides should get together as expeditiously as possible. When does the majority leader feel that the majority will be ready with its committee list?

Mr. McFARLAND. The majority leader will try to be ready before the minority is ready.

Mr. WHERRY. I would not say that a horse race would result in the minority being ahead of the majority, but I do wish to see the committees organized just as soon as both sides are ready.

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes; and I hope they may be ready by Monday.

Mr. WHERRY. The minority will not have a conference by Monday, probably not until Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. McFARLAND. Then, we will wait on the Senator.

I should like to announce that following the President's address on Monday, the Senate will reconvene, at which time Senators will be given an opportunity to introduce bills and present other routine business.

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to hear the announcement of the Senator from Arizona.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next, January 8, 1951, at 12:30 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 8, 1951, at 12:30 o'clock p. m.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1951

The Senate met at 12:30 p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, who in the toils and troubles of time has set vistas of eternity in our hearts, save us from the supreme hypocrisy of making this holy moment of communion with the unseen and eternal but a conventional gesture of unfelt piety. At this high altar of the national life, preserve us from praying with our lips only, and not with our hearts and minds. As with anxious hearts, together with a listening world, we hear this day a diagnosis of the state of the Union, help us to face with utter honesty the state of our own inner lives. May we be deeply concerned that our personal attitudes shall be a part of the answer, and not a part of the problem of our social order.

As we come in a high hour of human destiny, solemnized by the tangled tragedy in which all human life is caught, help us in these testing days, rising above all that is base and small, to work together in glad and eager harmony for the honor, safety, and welfare of our Nation and of all the peoples of this stricken earth who unite in mutual good will, determined to open the gates of a new life for all mankind. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. McFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Friday, January 5, 1951, was dispensed with.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

On request of Mr. McFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SPARKMAN was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate today because of official business.

On request of Mr. O'MAHONEY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. HUNT was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate today by reason of illness.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. McFARLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES TO HEAR THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL ADDRESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, in accordance with the terms of House Concurrent Resolution No. 1, I move that the Senate now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of hearing the address of the President of the United States on the state of the Union, and that the Senate reconvene thereafter, at which time Senators may present petitions and memorials, introduce bills, submit resolutions, and transact other routine business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion is agreed to.

Thereupon (at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate, preceded by its Secretary (Leslie L. Biffle), its Sergeant at Arms (Joseph C. Duke), the Vice President and the President pro tempore, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States may be pleased to make to them.

ANNUAL MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 1)

The annual message of the President of the United States was this day delivered by him to the joint session of the two Houses of Congress.

(The full text of the message will be found in the proceedings of the House, pp. 98–101.)

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The Senate, having returned to its Chamber at 1 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m., reassembled, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

CONTROL OF INFLATION—RESOLUTION OF THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received this morning an important communication from the distinguished president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, Allan B. Kline, who has commented on the vital issue of control of inflation. I believe that the position of the federation will be most earnestly studied as the Congress further considers this issue, and in particular by the Senate and House Banking and Currency Committees.

I invite attention to Mr. Kline's able suggestions for cutting down on nonessential governmental expenditures, increasing governmental efficiency, pay-as-we-go taxation, and sane fiscal steps in order to curb the inflationary threat.

Attached to Mr. Kline's letter was the text of the resolution adopted by the delegates to the annual meeting of the federation held in Dallas, Tex., between December 11 and 14, and attended by numerous distinguished leaders, for example, from the Wisconsin Farm Bureau Federation, including Mr. Curtis Hatch, president.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Kline's letter to me be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD, together with the federation's resolution.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1951.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: The inflationary threat created by our present defense program has become a matter of common knowledge. Firm and effective action is necessary to counter this threat. Counter measures obviously are being taken. The grave danger facing us on the economic front is the possibility that the laudable desire to check inflation will lead to adoption of the wrong measures.

Price, wage, and ration controls cannot prevent inflation. If we put our faith in such measures, we not only will fail to prevent inflation, but we will also sell the defense program short by curbing the productive power, which is our greatest source of strength. In an emergency of long duration, such controls could destroy our free-choice economic system.

A part of the agitation for controls appears to stem from a misunderstanding of the situation we are in today. We are in a period of international tension which may last for several years. Our national policy is still (1) to prevent the outbreak of a third world war, and (2) to build up our national military and economic strength as rapidly as possible so that we will be able to win such a war if it proves unavoidable. We cannot estimate the probable duration of the present tension, or calculate when we may face the greatest test of our strength. Accordingly, we must adopt policies which will not only serve our present needs, but contribute to the rapid development of a much greater national strength.

Price and wage controls would hamper the development of the increased production we so badly need. This can easily be illustrated by reference to livestock and meat, although similar results can be expected if price and wage ceilings are applied in other areas of the economy.

Meat production is at a high level, but even greater production is needed. The production of meat—particularly pork—can be substantially increased in the coming year if hampering restrictions are avoided. We have a large hog population to supply brood sows; we have the second largest supply of corn in our history; and we have the equipment and know-how.

Production, both of feed and of livestock, can be stepped up on an enduring basis. This is what we need in America. Farmers are ready to produce. The most effective steps which could be taken by Government to assure an adequate production of livestock would be to (1) make the fullest use of the outlook material of the United States Department of Agriculture indicating probable firm demand, (2) assure farmers that price and ration controls are not going to be put on meat, and (3) suspend corn acreage allotments for the 1951 crop.

Price and ration controls on livestock and meat inevitably will mean less meat. Farmers must make many decisions which influence the quantity of meat they will produce. Price and ration controls cannot help but tip the balance on many of these decisions toward less production. Stepped-up production on an enduring basis is the consumer's best hope for adequate meat suplies and reasonable prices. Under a control system, meat might seem to be cheap in the butcher shops, but it would not be in the shops.

Experience has demonstrated that ceilings on meat invite black markets. Under OPA, black markets resulted in enormous waste of labor in legitimate plants; reduced volume for such plants and consequent reductions in the taxes paid by them; loss of valuable byproducts which were vitally needed; and creation of a public health hazard by the sale of uninspected meat. Experience under OPA definitely proved that, even if more effective measures can be developed to cope with the black market, an army of administrative personnel would be required, both in government and in the industry. Manpower is one of our most serious shortages; we cannot afford to divert thousands of workers from the production of goods to the administration of unnecessary and unworkable regulations.

In this time of national emergency, we are calling on you to support measures—such as (1) the elimination of all nonessential governmental expenses, (2) increased efficiency in Government, (3) pay-as-we-go taxation, and (4) necessary steps in the field of monetary, credit, and fiscal policy—which action will really control inflation. In addition, it is only reasonable that we make greater use of techniques which have enabled our economic system to outstrip every other system of production and distribution.

It is because price controls are clumsy and inefficient substitutes for the automatic functioning of market prices, that we oppose such controls. Our policy in this regard is not taken with the idea of serving the special interests of farmers as a group; instead, we have firm conviction that our recommendations are in the general interests of all Americans. Price, wage, and ration controls have more in common with totalitarian principles than with the principles which support our free American system. Such measures cannot prevent inflation, but certainly would impair our national strength by interfering with production.

Our position on these vital matters is set forth more completely in the enclosed copy of a resolution, inflation control, which was approved by the elected delegates from our member State farm bureaus at our annual meeting in Dallas, Tex., last month.

Sincerely yours,

A. B. KLINE,
President.

RESOLUTION APPROVED BY THE VOTING DELEGATES TO THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, HELD IN DALLAS, TEX., DECEMBER 11–14, 1950

INFLATION CONTROL

The American Farm Bureau Federation has long urged that aggressive steps be taken in the monetary, credit, and fiscal policy fields to bring greater stability to the general price level. Since the control of monetary, credit, and fiscal policy rests in the hands of the Federal Government, under the Constitution, the problem is not one of delegating authority to the Federal Government in new areas. It is a matter of reshaping and coordinating policies in a field in which Government policy now largely prevails so that such policies will make a greater contribution to the development of a more stable price level.

Monetary, credit, and fiscal policies which affect the general stability of prices are indirect and impersonal as contrasted with the direct and personal controls that are required by specific programs designed to rectify the dislocations and injustices resulting from an unstable price level. Greater stability of the general price level offers the only opportunity for greater economic security without programs which require specific and direct controls on each farm, business, or individual.

The inflationary pressures generated by our present national defense program make effective action to stabilize the purchasing power of the American dollar more urgent now than ever before.

Inflation cannot be stopped by price, wage, and ration controls. Such measures deal with symptoms rather than fundamental causes. They interfere with production; impair the flexibility of our economy; reduce our capacity to expand output; require huge administrative staffs; and invite black markets. We face an emergency of indefinite duration. In such a situation the premature adoption of price, wage, and ration controls could strangle our economy to the point of impairing our ability to fight an all-out war should such a conflict prove unavoidable.

American farmers have produced beyond belief in times of need and we pledge ourselves to ample production now. We believe that if we are given full information as to production desired, and if productive aids are made available to us, we can produce more food and fiber more efficiently if controls are held to an absolute minimum. We insist that we be given an opportunity to demonstrate our productive capacity without controls. If total war forces the application of price and wage ceilings, we will insist that they be applied on an across-the-board basis.

The present situation calls for a bold attack on the fundamental cause of inflation, which cause is an increase in the supply of money in relation to the supplies of goods and services available to consumers.

Most importantly, we must pay the bill. There is no possibility of controlling inflation without taxes high enough to get on a pay-as-we-go basis.

We must strive to meet increased demand with increased production wherever possible. To do this we must enhance the opportunity of individuals to be productive and increase the length of the workweek. Strict Government economy is a must. Nonessential Government expenditures must be eliminated. Necessary Government borrowing must be planned so as to prevent an increase in the Government debt to the banks, because such an increase would both directly and indirectly increase the supply of money. To this end we urge that efforts to sell E bonds be intensified; that careful consideration be given to the desirability of offering additional inducement for holders to reinvest the proceeds of maturing E bonds in Government securities; and that steps be taken to prevent a further shift of non-bank-held negotiable bonds to the banking system.

The national debt should be so handled as to make the maximum contribution to price and economic stability, rather than to finance the debt at a minimum cost.

Monetary and credit policies carried on by the Federal Reserve System cannot alone achieve a stable level of prices. Yet they are an important factor and should be geared toward that objective. The Federal Reserve's authority to vary the member bank reserve requirements should be increased. If the inflation threat continues reserve requiremnts for banks should be raised, with appropriate adjustments in the bank holdings eligible to be counted as reserves.

The Government's present policy of restricting the expansion of housing and installment credit should be continued in effect, with such adjustments as may be necessary from time to time to keep these restrictions consistent with the requirements of an effective program to control inflation.

We reiterate our recommendation that the Congress establish a bipartisan Joint Congressional Monetary Study Commission, charged with the responsibility of making studies and submitting recommendations to the Congress on means of bringing greater stability to the purchasing power of money.

ENLISTMENT OF CERTAIN ALIENS IN THE ARMY AND REGULAR ARMY OF UNITED STATES

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in association with a bipartisan group of Senators, including the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], I introduce for appropriate reference two bills, both of which have the purpose of making it possible for foreign young men who have a common cause with us to fight for the cause in which we and they both believe.

The first bill is simply a modification of the existing law. It extends the program from the present terminal date of 1953 to a terminal date of 1955 and it increases the ceiling of the present law from 2,500 to 25,000 men. Existing law, it should be mentioned, makes it possible for these men to be used in any assignment designed to promote the best interests of the United States.

The second bill is a renewal of the bill which I introduced at the last Congress to set up a Volunteer Freedom Corps of 250,000 men. Where the first bill would aim to obtain potential officers and non-commissioned officers who would be available for training and leading larger numbers of young aliens in case of war, the second bill concerns itself with the large number of young men who would be interested only in wartime service and who would not be making a career of the military life. The young men of the Volunteer Freedom Corps would, presumably, be enlisted abroad and would only serve abroad. They would not have the same privileges or the same status as those in the first bill who would be subject to a very thorough screening, with United States citizenship at the end of 5 years of honorable service.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point a statement by me giving further particulars on this subject, together with the texts of the two bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bills and the statement by the Senator from Massachusetts and the texts of the bills will be printed in the RECORD.

The Chair hears no objection.

The statement presented by Mr. LODGE is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LODGE

Today, in association with a bipartisan group of Senators, including Senators BREWSTER, HICKENLOOPER, IVES, MUNDT, and HUNT, I am introducing two bills, both of which have the purpose of making it possible for foreign young men who have a common cause with us to fight for the cause in which we and they both believe.

The first bill is simply a modification of the existing law. It extends the program from the present terminal date of 1953 to a terminal date of 1955 and it increases the ceiling of the present law from 2,500 to 25,000 men. Existing law, it should be mentioned, makes it possible for these men to be used in any assignment designed to promote the best interests of the United States.

The second bill is a renewal of the bill which I introduced at the last Congress to set up a Volunteer Freedom Corps of 250,000 men. Where the first bill would aim to obtain potential officers and noncommissioned officers who would be available for training and leading larger numbers of young aliens in case of war, the second bill concerns itself with the large number of young men who would be interested only in wartime service and who would not be making a career of the military life. The young men of the Volunteer Freedom Corps would, presumably, be enlisted abroad and would only serve abroad. They would not have the same privileges or the same status as those in the first bill who would be subject to a very thorough screening, with United States citizenship at the end of 5 years of honorable service.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point further particulars on this subject, together with the texts of the two bills:

One vital element of the struggle for existence in which we are now engaged relates to the question of who does the fighting. It is made especially acute by the fact that our opponent fights without expending his own manpower. We Americans, on the other hand, have been required to shed the blood of our own young manhood in order to combat those who fight at our opponent's bidding. One of the most urgent questions of our time is therefore: How long we can tolerate an arrangement in which we, in terms of manpower, can never win, and they, in the same terms, can never lose?

Money and matériel have great importance, but our greatest and inestimable treasure is our manpower. Certainly, one great object of a successful foreign policy is that there be other people who have a common cause with us and who are both willing and able to fight for that cause. This means that our allies in the Atlantic Pact must promptly get in a strong defensive posture. It means integrating into the defense against Communist imperialism the former enemy nations, Germany and Japan. It means removing the obstacles which now exist to the participation of the former neutrals—Ireland and Spain. It also means immediate formation of military units composed of stateless anti-Communist Slavs. These measures, if taken promptly, will all mean that our American manhood will not in the future be required to carry alone the full load of combat.

The Soviet Union, ever since 1945, has used puppets and satellites to do its fighting for it and to work behind the lines, using political and subversive methods. We Americans will always do our full share of the fighting ourselves, but we must meet this new threat with as much imagination and as much willingness to use new methods as the Soviets do.

Coming to the Senate in 1947, I introduced legislation authorizing the enlisting of selected aliens in the United States Army, thereby making use of some of the millions of anti-Communist young men in the world who would like to fight on our side. It was only last August—more than 3 years later—that this bill finally became law, but the figure had been cut down to 2,500 men. In the second session of the Eighty-first Congress I introduced legislation for a Volunteer Freedom Corps of 250,000 men. Surely, the staggeringly effective use which the Soviets are making of puppet armies must at last have aroused us to the value—not of having puppets of our own—but of having stout-hearted and enthusiastic allies on our side, whether in the uniform of their own country or in the uniform of the United States.

There is one more category, and that is the great mass of anti-Communist freedom-loving young men from behind the iron curtain. Estimates of the number having an effective potential of military service run as high as 2,000,000. One of the greatest authorities on the subject told me that in case of war the United States could recruit as many of these young men as we could clothe and equip, provided—and he stressed this proviso—we have professional officers in sufficient numbers who spoke their language and knew their customs to organize them into effective military formations and lead them in combat.

One of Hitler's most glaring errors in World War II was his stupid handling of the millions of anti-Communist Russians who hated their Russian rulers so much that they welcomed the German conquerors with open arms. One of the most famous Russian anti-Communist leaders was General Vlasov, who organized an army of non-Communist Russians to fight on the German side. I saw some of these Vlasov soldiers at the time of the invasion of southern France. They were in German uniform and appeared to be Mongolians. There were several millions of anti-Communist men available, but Hitler did not have enough professional officers who spoke their language and knew their customs to organize them into effective military formations and lead them in combat.

It is unfortunate that the Soviets interested themselves in the possibilities of using alien soldiers long before we did and we are paying a big price for this in Korea at this moment. Their employment of alien troops, however, depends basically on force and compulsion whereas the essence of the employment of alien troops such as we propose is voluntaryism. In fact, we must never lose sight of the fact that the American way to receive the foreign soldier is on a basis which is both voluntary and equal. The argument that it is pernicious and debilitating to hire mercenary adventurers as replacements for your own men, who would thus escape military service, is sound; and we should actively oppose such a proposal. But we should as actively seek, instead, the help of selected alien soldiers on the same voluntary basis which actuated the countless aliens who fought for our country during the War of the Revolution, the Mexican War, the Civil War, and thereafter. It is safe to say that we could never have made our maximum effort in those wars without the alien soldier, fighting on a vounteer basis in the uniform of the United States. In all our wars we have welcomed allies who fight at our side under their own flag and in the uniform of their own country. We should not reject—indeed, we should warmly welcome—the individual ally who wears our uniform and fights under our flag. We should sense the immense difference between the mercenary hireling and the volunteer citizen candidate for which our present law provides.

We should start now to organize the many young men in Europe whose fatherland is in the grip of the Communist dictatorship, and who cannot join the army of their own country. There is obviously no organization which is as ready to receive these young men; process them; clothe, house, and feed them; and arm, equip, and train them, as is the United States Army.

The fact that under this plan these young fighters for freedom would be part of the United States Army means that their services could be used in support of the United Nations. Without the United States Army, it is highly doubtful that these men would be available in significant numbers, since no other country would be able to organize them at anything approaching a rapid rate of speed.

I say this in the knowledge that there are sincere persons, some of them Members of this body, who favor a so-called international police force in which men from many nations serve as individuals—a force in which all those who serve in it—the man from the palms, the man from the pines, the Christian, and the Arab—are supposed to give up their citizenship and cheerfully submit to a common pay schedule, a common ration, and a common code of justice and discipline. Of course, that is something which as civilians they would never even think of doing. Those who advocate this proposal fail to realize that an army is but the military expression of the civilian community—that the army must be based on the civilian society, and not the civilian society based on the army. There is also the financial burden which such a force would be to the United Nations, a burden which most of the nations would find unbearable, even though the United States would defray, as it does now, the largest share of the United Nations' cost. Perhaps the time will come when such a scheme is feasible, but all must agree that it cannot possibly be of practical help in the present crisis.

To sum up. There are five sources of manpower with which to build armies to fight for freedom: First, the United States; second, our allies; third, our former enemies; fourth, the former neutrals; and fifth, the anti-Communist, freedom-loving aliens who have no army of their own to join.

Such men fighting side by side with Americans, allies, former enemies, and former neutrals would present a front of fervent, ardent, and convinced anti-Communist fighters for freedom. This would strongly tend to prevent aggression. It would also insure that, if war should come, the cost in terms of precious manpower would be equitably shared by men from all the freedom-loving peoples. Such a policy is both militarily sound and morally right, and we should waste no time in putting it into action.

The bill (S. 238) to provide for the enlistment of aliens in the Army of the United States for service outside the continental United States in a Volunteer Freedom Corps, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. LODGE (for himself, Mr. BREWSTER, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. IVES, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. HENDRICKSON, and Mr. HUNT), was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Army is authorized until June 30, 1955, with the approval of the Secretary of State and subject to the provisions of this act, to accept voluntary enlistments or reenlistments in the Army of the United States for service outside the continental United States in a Volunteer Freedom Corps, of qualified, unmarried, male aliens in such enlisted grades and under such terms and conditions as may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of the Army: Provided, That the total number of persons serving under the provisions of this section shall at no time exceed the sum of 250,000.

SEC. 2. Persons enlisted in the Army of the United States under provisions of the first section of this act shall—

(a) be not less than 18 years of age or more than 35 years of age;

(b) be without dependents as defined in section 102 of the Career Compensation Act of 1949;

(c) be enlisted for such term of enlistment, not less than 2 years, as the Secretary of the Army shall prescribe;

(d) while serving under such enlistment receive such pay and allowances as the Secretary of the Army shall prescribe, except that such pay and allowances shall not be more than the pay and allowances received by nationals of the United States who are serving in like enlisted grades, have the same length of service, and are serving under the same or similar conditions;

(e) not be assigned to any duty within the territorial limits of the United States.

SEC. 3. No person enlisted in the Army of the United States under provisions of the first section of this act shall, by reason of his service therein, be entitled—

(a) to receive any benefit provided by any law administered by the Veterans' Administration or any other law providing any retirement, pension, compensation, or other benefit for nationals of the United States by reason or their service in the Armed Forces of the United States; or

(b) to be admitted into the United States under any of the immigration laws of the United States, or

(c) to qualify for naturalization as a citizen of the United States.

SEC. 4. Provisions of law prohibiting the payment of any person not a citizen of the United States shall not apply to persons enlisted under provisions of the first section of this act.

SEC. 5. So much of section 2 of the act approved August 1, 1894 (28 Stat., ch. 179, 216; 10 U. S. C. 625), as amended, as reads "and in time of peace no person (except an Indian) who is not a citizen of the United States or who has not made legal declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall be enlisted for the first enlistment in the Army" is hereby suspended until June 30, 1955, with respect to all persons enlisted under provisions of the first section of this act.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Army is authorized to promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as he shall deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Army is further authorized to appoint civilian citizens of the United States and of other nations to serve with the Volunteer Freedom Corps in such positions and for such periods of time as he may deem will fulfill the purposes of this act.

SEC. 8. The Secretary of the Army may discharge any officer or member of the corps for cause, disability, or for the convenience of the Government. The officers and members of the corps shall be subject to such disciplinary regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, including provision for the punishment by summary discharge, and shall be subject to the Articles of War.

The bill (S. 239) to amend the act of June 30, 1950 (Public Law 597, 81st Cong.), relating to the enlistment of aliens in the Regular Army, introduced by Mr. LODGE (for himself, Mr. BREWSTER, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. IVES, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. HENDRICKSON, and Mr. HUNT), was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the first section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the enlistment of aliens in the Regular Army," approved June 30, 1950 (Public Law 597, 81st Cong.), is amended (1) by striking out "June 30, 1953" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1955," and (2) by striking out "two thousand five hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty-five thousand."

(b) Section 3 of such act is amended by striking out "June 30, 1953" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1955."

AUDUBON CENTENNIAL YEAR

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill authorizing the President of the United States to issue a proclamation designating 1951 as Audubon Centennial Year, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared with reference to the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 248) authorizing the President of the United States to issue a proclamation designating 1951 as Audubon Centennial Year, introduced by Mr. HOLLAND, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement presented by Mr. HOLLAND is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HOLLAND CONCERNING THE AUDUBON CENTENNIAL YEAR

The year 1951 is the centenary of the death of John James Audubon, the distinguished pioneer artist and naturalist who made outstanding contributions to American life and art through his paintings of American birds and mammals. He successfully completed the monumental task to which he dedicated his life in painting 1,065 birds of 489 species in 435 separate paintings.

Such a task was not easy in Audubon's time. There were no photographs nor mounted specimens to guide him. He traversed the wilds from Labrador to Louisiana and the Florida Keys, and from Pennsylvania to Texas, enduring the hardships of primitive travel to paint his birds in their natural habitat.

Audubon lived in a pioneer era when America's natural resources seemed as limitless as the horizons to the west. Yet Audubon cried out against the wanton destruction of birds and animals that he witnessed wherever he went, and warned, "The war of extermination cannot last many years more."

It is little wonder that, when in 1886 an organization was formed for the protection of American birds not used for food, it should take the name Audubon Society. Today the National Audubon Society and its affiliated organizations across the continent constitute one of the greatest conservation organizations in the world. The major purpose of the society is to advance public understanding of the value and need of conservation of soil, water, plants, and wildlife and the relation of their intelligent treatment and wise use to human welfare. To achieve this object it has enrolled nearly 9,000,000 children in Audubon Junior Clubs; it conducts four Audubon camps for the instruction of youth leaders in nature and conservation subjects; it carries on a regular educational lecture program in 140 cities; it provides warden service for the protection of birds and other wildlife on some 2,000,000 acres of land and water in the United States; and it conducts research in an effort to find ways and means of saving and restoring species of birds and other animals threatened with extinction.

The year 1951 offers a singular opportunity to pay tribute to John James Audubon and his contributions to our cultural heritage. Therefore, I am introducing in the Congress this bill which authorizes the President of the United States to issue a proclamation in observance of Audubon Centennial Year.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT TO ACCOMPANY REPORTS OF COMMITTEES OF CONFERENCE

Mr. HAYDEN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representative concurring), That there shall accompany every report of a committee of conference a statement, in writing and signed by at least a majority of the managers on the part of each House, explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the committee.

Sec. 2. The foregoing section shall be a rule of each House, respectively, and shall supersede any other rule thereof but only to the extent that it is inconsistent with such other rule.

WRITTEN REPORTS TO ACCOMPANY BILLS, ETC.

Mr. FERGUSON (for himself, Mr. BRIDGES, and Mr. BYRD) submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That on and after January 3, 1952 section 133 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) (1) All bills and joint resolutions reported from committees of the Senate or the House of Representatives other than Appropriation Committees shall be accompanied by reports in writing, which shall be printed; and there shall be included in each such report or in an accompanying document an estimate from the department or other agency of the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of the Government primarily concerned with the expenditure of any funds required to meet the probable cost of carrying out the legislation proposed in such bill or resolution over the first 5-year period of its operation or over the period of its operation if such legislation will be effective for less than 5 years.

"(2) Estimates received from departments or agencies under this subsection may be submitted by the committees to the Bureau of the Budget for review, and such reviews, when practicable, shall be included within the accompanying documents before said bills and joint resolutions are reported.

"(3) The Appropriations Committees of both Houses shall maintain compilations of all such estimates, and quarterly shall print those compilations (together with any comment of the Bureau of the Budget) in the form of anticipated legislative budgets for each of the ensuing 5 fiscal years for the information of the Congress."

REVISION AND PRINTING OF SENATE MANUAL

Mr. HAYDEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 4), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules and Administration be, and it is hereby, directed to prepare a revised edition of the Senate Rules and Manual for the use of the Eighty-second Congress, and that 1,500 additional copies shall be printed and bound, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the Senate, 200 copies for the use of the Committee on Rules and Administration, and the remaining 300 copies shall be bound in full morocco and tagged as to contents and delivered as may be directed by the committee.

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN CLERICAL AND OTHER ASSISTANTS ON PAYROLL OF SENATE

Mr. HAYDEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 5), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That in the case of the resignation of a Senator during his term of office, his clerical and other assistants on the payroll of the Senate on the date of such resignation shall be continued on such payroll at their respective salaries for a period of not to exceed 30 days: Provided, That any such assistants continued on the payroll, while so continued, shall perform their duties under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, and he hereby is authorized and directed to remove from such payroll any such assistants who are not attending to the duties for which their services are continued: Provided further, That this shall not operate to continue such assistants on such payroll beyond the expiration of their Senator's term of service.

INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES BY COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY—ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL

Mr. McCARRAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 6), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by subsection (k) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, or by section 134 (a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the period beginning on February 1, 1951, and ending on January 31, 1952, to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $97,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INTERNAL SECURITY—INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES BY COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. McCARRAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 7), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the limitation of expenditures under Senate Resolution 366, Eighty-first Congress, relating to the internal security of the United States, agreed to December 21, 1950, is hereby increased by $, and such sum together with any unexpended balance of the sum previously authorized to be expended under such resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee and covering obligations incurred under such resolution on or before December 31, 1952.

(Mr. WHERRY submitted Senate Resolution 8, providing that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area pending the formulation of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress, which was ordered to lie on the table, and appears under a separate heading.)

EVA MALENA THOMAS

Mr. KNOWLAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 9), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Eva Malena Thomas, mother of Mark Poulton Thomas, late an employee of the Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

SEATING OF COMMUNIST CHINA IN ORGANS OF UNITED NATIONS

Mr. O'CONOR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 10), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the forces of freedom and democracy, bound together under the Charter of the United Nations, are engaged in bloody conflict against the forces of totalitarian aggression; and

Whereas by its constant intransigence and complete disregard for the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the fundamental principles of international law, Soviet Russia has continuously flouted the desires of the great majority of the member states of the United Nations and impeded the orderly operations of the organs of the United Nations; and

Whereas Communist China, an unlawful puppet and satellite of the Soviet Union, is now engaged in hostilities against United Nations forces in Korea and is seeking to be seated in the organs of the United Nations; and

Whereas if Communist China be seated in the organs of the United Nations an additional disrupting and unlawful influence would be added, serving to impede further the orderly processes designed to maintain peace in the world; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the seating of Communist China in any of the organs of the United Nations would constitute sanction by that body of acts of international piracy and brigandage which makes mockery of the aims and purposes of the United Nations, its organs and its agencies; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States reaffirms its faith in the United Nations as a means of maintaining international peace and security: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to instruct the delegation of the United States to the United Nations, its organs, and agencies to take all possible appropriate steps to insure that representatives of Communist China not be seated in any of the organs or agencies of the United Nations.

Resolved further, That the President is hereby requested to instruct the United States representative in the Security Council to exercise the veto on any proposal to admit Communist China to membership in the United Nations.

PARDONS TO CERTAIN CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 11), which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Resolved, That the President is requested to grant pardons to all persons heretofore convicted and sentenced for failure to register or report for service in the military forces as provided in the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, and the Selective Service Act of 1948, by reason of their religious convictions.

INVESTIGATION OF CAUSE OF EXISTING CEMENT SHORTAGE

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 12), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete study and investigation of the existing cement shortage with a view to ascertaining the causes for such shortage. In the conduct of such investigation special attention shall be given to determining (1) whether large amounts of cement are being withheld pending further price increases or by any Government agency, and (2) whether such shortage appears to be the result of unlawful actions on the part of any group or groups.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date but not later than January 15, 1951.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable, and is authorized, with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government. The expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INVESTIGATION OF CAUSE OF COLLISION ON LONG ISLAND RAILROAD

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 13), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the cause or causes of the collision which occurred on the Long Island Railroad on November 22, 1950. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem desirable.

INVESTIGATION OF ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN GERMANY AND AUSTRIA

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 14), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the administration of justice in the American zones of occupation in Germany and Austria with a view to ascertaining (1) the extent to which persons who are or have been Communists were given responsibility for the policies and administration of justice in such zones; (2) the extent of which persons who are or have been Communists were given responsibility for the program for denazification of several million Germans; (3) whether or not the activities of such persons were responsible for the moving of many German and Austrian engineers, scientists, and other highly trained men to Russia; and (4) whether any of the persons now employed by the State Department in connection with the administration of justice in such zones are or have been members of the Communist Party. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its study and investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it may deem necessary to provide for improvement of the administration of justice in the American zones of occupation in Germany and Austria.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ on a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $ shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INVESTIGATION OF DISPOSITION OF MONEYS PAID FOR ADMISSION TO THE BAR OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 15), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a full study and investigation into the alleged practice of the Committee on Admissions and Grievances of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia of appropriating to its own use moneys paid for admission to the bar of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. The committee shall report the results of such study and investigation to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, together with its recommendations for such legislation or other action as it deems necessary.

INVESTIGATION OF OPERATIONS OF PROGRAM FOR PROCUREMENT OF SUPPLIES, ETC., IN DEFENSE DEPARTMENT

Mr. FERGUSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 16), which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the operation of the program for the procurement and construction of supplies, materials, munitions, vehicles, aircraft, vessels, plants, camps, and other articles and facilities in connection with the national defense, including (1) the types and terms of contracts awarded on behalf of the United States; (2) the methods by which such contracts are awarded and contractors selected; (3) the utilization of the facilities of small business concerns, through subcontracts or otherwise; (4) the geographic distribution of contracts and location of plants and facilities; (5) the effect of such program with respect to labor and the migration of labor; (6) the performance of contracts and the accountings required of contractors; (7) benefits accruing to contractors with respect to amortization for the purposes of taxation or otherwise; (8) practices of management or labor, and prices, fees, and charges, which interfere with such program or unduly increase its costs; and (9) such other matters as the committee deems appropriate. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eighty-first and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistance, to require by subpena, or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to make such investigations, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to incur such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $____, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ASSIGNMENT OF GROUND TROOPS FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, we have heard the President's message, and I have already stated that I thought it temperate in character. I desire now to send to the desk a resolution prompted by the message, which I ask to have read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and read.

The resolution (S. Res. 8) was read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the formulation of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress.

Mr. WHERRY. In his message, I think the President exercised the best of judgment when he invited constructive criticism and debate. I think his message is encouraging in its recommendations for expanding the military establishment and for producing more planes and munitions, but I think his failure to present a global policy indicating the use to be made thereof is a disappointment. The message leaves the inference that the past policy of drift will be continued.

But on the vital issue of whether United States ground troops should now be sent to western Europe—and I emphasize "now"—the President is silent, although in a recent press conference he stated he would send divisions of United States troops to western Europe. Apparently he has committed us to the sending of ground troops, regardless of the opposition which has been made and is being made to that character of mutual aid, and regardless of the fact that, under the North Atlantic Defense Treaty, Congress has full power to determine the character of the mutual aid that shall be provided.

The issue of whether America's resources in money and manpower are to be dissipated pursuant to that policy or directed to the establishment of mastery of the air, with a ring of air bases surrounding Russia, is fundamental to all preparedness plans.

Therefore, I am submitting to the Senate a resolution declaring it to be the sense of the Senate that no United States ground troops shall be sent to western Europe pending determination by the Congress of a policy on that matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and will lie on the table.

PRINTING OF REPORTS ENTITLED "AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS AND THE MOBILIZATION PROGRAM" (S. DOC. NO. 3) AND "NICKEL" (S. DOC. NO. 4)

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the recent reports of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee entitled "Agricultural Products and the Mobilization Program" and "Nickel," be printed as Senate documents.

The subcommittee has made rather thorough studies of these problems and its efforts have already resulted in the taking of many constructive steps by the departments concerned. We are confident that additional steps will also be taken as a result of the subcommittee's findings and recommendations. I am sure Senators will be interested in reading these reports, and I ask that they be printed as Senate documents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JUSTICE FOR POLAND—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEHMAN

[Mr. LEHMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by him on December 31, 1950, at Springfield, Ohio, entitled "Justice for Poland," which appears in the Appendix.]

[Mr. HOLLAND asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Today's Guest of Honor," published in the Tampa (Fla.) Tribune, of November 21, 1950, and an editorial entitled "A Sound Thinker," from the same newspaper, under date of November 23, 1950, paying tributes to James A. Farley, which appear in the Appendix.]

FEWER STRIKES FOR MORE PEOPLE—EDITORIAL BY MAURICE R. FRANKS

[Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Fewer Strikes for More People," written by Maurice R. Franks and published in Partners magazine, which appears in the Appendix.]

BACKGROUND OF THE TWENTY-EIGHTH DIVISION—ARTICLE BY RAY CARPENTER

[Mr. MARTIN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Background of the Twenty-eighth Division," written by Ray Carpenter, division historian, which appears in the Appendix.]

YULETIDE PRAYERS—NEWSPAPER ARTICLE

[Mr. SCHOEPPEL asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the special Christmas column written by A. L. Shultz and published in several Kansas newspapers, which appears in the Appendix.]

COMMUNIST CHINA AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD two editorials, the first entitled "The UN Must Act," from the New York Herald Tribune, the second entitled "UN Put to the Test," from the New York Times, both dealing with the problem now facing the United Nations of deciding whether to declare Red China an aggressor.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of January 8, 1951]

THE UN MUST ACT

Spurred by growing bewilderment and doubt throughout the country, the State Department has undertaken a vigorous diplomatic offensive to get from the United Nations a statement that China has been guilty of aggression in Korea. Less could hardly be asked of an international organization which is, among other things, the standard bearer of the world's concept of right and wrong. An argument was possible directly after the Chinese intervention, and before the thirty-eighth parallel had been crossed, to the effect that the branding of China as aggressor would hamper efforts to achieve a truce. Even then, however, it seemed to us the proper course to keep the facts on the record straight, calling aggression by its obvious name, and proceeding to deal with the situation with patience and statesmanlike magnanimity.

Some hope apparently persists among non-Communist nations that, in spite of all, cease-fire arrangements can be worked out. Some fear exists that to name China as aggressor will be a prelude to all-out war. The hope is so slim as to be negligible; moreover, if the Chinese were to find it in their interests to call a truce, the charge of aggression would hardly deter them. As for the fear of all-out war, the definition of China's offense does not in any way commit the UN or the United States to such an engagement. With the aggressor recognized for what he is, it then becomes the task of policy makers to decide by what means and to what extent he is to be checked and punished.

Originally the charge of aggression was to be made by the Security Council; but the inevitability of a Russian veto where any of its satellites or minions are involved led to the provision which makes it possible for the veto-free Assembly to take up the issue. For the Assembly not to act would be a shock indeed. For it to act unconvincingly, with numerous abstentions, would be almost as bad. The need is for a decisive move—for an unequivocal statement which will have the effect of restoring to the international scene a reality of which protracted evasions have robbed it. For lack of such a statement the free world remains divided and confused, and the Chinese breach retains a shadow of wholly improper justification. For lack of it, too, the UN declines daily in men's opinion. The State Department, in presenting forcefully the United States point of view, is serving not only the interests of our country but of law and freedom everywhere.

[From the New York Times of January 8, 1951]

UN PUT TO THE TEST

In urging members of the United Nations to take a firm stand against Chinese Communist aggression in Korea and to call that aggression by its rightful name the United States is acting in the interest of the United Nations. The positions that the world organization takes and the degree to which it is willing to stand by its professions of principles will largely determine whether it can and will survive. If it surrenders its integrity now in the name of a supposititious expediency it will have betrayed the purposes for which it was conceived and in its confession of impotence invited its own dissolution.

The reasons for hesitation on the part of many countries are quite understandable and they should be viewed sympathetically. They are deeply concerned lest the Organization, or one of its major members, become involved in a war with Communist China. Some are likewise concerned lest a large United States commitment in Asia leave too little for purposes of commitment in Europe. The first of those two feelings is the more praiseworthy but they are both very real.

The United States shares both of those feelings. This country does not want to see the battle for Korea develop into a war with the Communist Chinese or with anyone else. This country certainly does not want an overcommitment in any theater to the detriment of another point of need. Because of those attitudes the United States has expressed its willingness to explore all possibilities for a peaceful settlement of the Korean struggle. But that exploration must be realistic, both in the physical and in the moral sense.

Some of the delay in United Nations action has been caused by just such an exploration. There is a hopeful waiting to see if a successful peace formula can be devised. Some parts of the various formulas thus far advanced have been anything but realistic. Both the Asian-Arab bloc and the three-man truce committee, as well as Prime Minister Nehru, in London, have suggested that as part of a general settlement there should be the establishment of a free and united Korea with nation-wide elections under United Nations auspices. There is nothing in the record to suggest that the North Koreans, the Chinese Communists, or the Soviet Union would consent to such a plan for the fraction of a second. To put it forward therefore as an objective to be gained, perhaps, by negotiation with Peiping (contingent, of course, upon Peiping's admission to the United Nations) is pure fantasy.

The Chinese Communists are in Korea today, more than a million strong, precisely to prevent the establishment of a free and unified Korea under United Nations auspices. They are fighting the United Nations on the battlefield, just as the Soviet Union has steadily fought the United Nations in the diplomatic arena, to keep the United Nations from carrying out, in Korea, the very purposes to which it is honorably committed. To assume that their admission to the councils of the United Nations will reverse this objective is to lose touch with reality. No Communists, Korean, Chinese, Russian, or American, want a free Korea, and they are willing to risk a war to prevent it.

Likewise, they not merely risk but boldly demand the complete moral disintegration of the United Nations. The United Nations is told upon what terms it can capitulate in the face of aggression. It can admit its grievous and illegal error in denouncing that aggression in the first place and take the sponsors, abettors and finally the partners in that aggression into its humbled bosom. The alternative is to be driven into the sea. If the United Nations does so capitulate it will have announced to the world that there is one moral principle of resistance to aggression when the aggressor is small and quite another and quite opposite principle of resistance when the aggressor is sufficiently powerful and arrogant. To make that admission is to put an end to the moral value of the United Nations Charter. If aggression against the free Republic of Korea was wrong last June it is wrong now and a million Chinese Communists can't make it right.

The United Nations, thanks to Soviet obstruction, does not have the physical force to counter any and all aggression. But it does have the moral obligation to remain committed against it. The present United Nations forces may be defeated in the field and obliged to retreat. That is no reason why the United Nations need be defeated in the world of morals and forced into oblivion.

REPUBLICAN POLICY COMMITTEE

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the policy committee is a committee established by statute. I send to the desk the names of the members of the Republican Policy Committee.

The names of the members of the Republican Policy Committee are as follows:

EUGENE D. MILLIKIN, of Colorado, chairman of conference.
ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, chairman, policy committee.
KENNETH S. WHERRY, of Nebraska, floor leader for minority.
LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, of Massachusetts, whip for minority.
MILTON R. YOUNG, of North Dakota, secretary for conference.
WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, of California.
H. ALEXANDER SMITH, of New Jersey.
HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan.
EDWARD J. THYE, of Minnesota.
OWEN BREWSTER, of Maine.
EDWARD MARTIN, of Pennsylvania.

DEMOCRATIC POLICY COMMITTEE

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a list of the membership of the majority policy committee.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MCFARLAND, Arizona, chairman.
Mr. RUSSELL, Georgia.
Mr. O'MAHONEY, Wyoming.
Mr. GREEN, Rhode Island.
Mr. HILL, Alabama.
Mr. KERR, Oklahoma.
Mr. CHAPMAN, Kentucky.
Mr. JOHNSON, Texas, majority whip, ex officio.
Mr. MCMAHON, Connecticut, secretary of the Democratic conference, ex officio.

THE FINANCING OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I should like to have 2 minutes for the purpose of addressing the Senate on the question of the financing of government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the financing of government is more important now than any time in our history. Herman A. Lowe, a special writer for the Philadelphia Inquirer, under date of January 6, has given some alarming figures as they relate to local and State government indebtedness. The figures reveal an increase of almost 50 percent in local and State government debt in the last 4-year period.

In these critical times we all realize that nondefense expenditures must be cut to the bone. Many of us who have had long experience in the lower levels of government realize that State and local governments could almost be destroyed by the taxing power of the Federal Government.

Without delay, we should work out a plan allocating taxes to each level of government and also setting forth the functions to be performed by each level of government.

Such a plan would cut down greatly the over-all cost of government because we could then do away with grants from the higher level of government to the lower level of government. The great strength of the American form of government is the part played by local government and State government.

I ask unanimous consent to have Mr. Lowe's article inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW TREND TOWARD ENORMOUS DEBTS GRAVE THREAT TO STATE GOVERNMENTS

(By Herman A. Lowe)

WASHINGTON, January 6.—Debts of the State and local governments are beginning to follow Federal debt into the stratosphere—although in a much more modest way. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, the combined debt of the 48 States and their local subdivisions reached a record total of $23,600,000,000.

Of course, that was small potatoes compared with the Federal Government's debt of $257,400,000,000 on the same date.

But the local-State debt has climbed nearly 50 percent in the 4 years since 1946.

That's a lot of climb. It provides something to think about for people whose Federal taxes were hiked twice by Congress in 1950, and who are promised at least one more stiff increase from Congress in 1951.

Economy and economy talk have gone out of fashion. Today Washington and the remainder of the Nation hear plenty about hurrying rearmament and providing the wherewithal to pay for the job. That's as it should be.

But much Federal spending has nothing to do with rearmament. There's room for cutbacks there. And only a minute share of local and State spending has any connection with rearmament or civil defense.

A breakdown of the over-all State-local debt shows this—the States owe $5,300,000,000. The cities owe $10,100,000,000. Counties and townships combined owe $2,000,000,000. Independent special district and independent local authorities owe $3,500,000,000; and the local school districts owe $2,700,000,000, aside from what the States owe on behalf of their school systems.

What this seems to add up to is that the States are in pretty good financial shape, but that the localities had better watch their step.

In the case of Pennsylvania the State's gross debt at the end of fiscal 1950 amounted to $804,715,000, a jump of about $500,000,000 over the previous year. The Keystone debt was only a little behind New York's $844,712,000 for the last fiscal year. Pennsylvania's gross per capita debt stood at $76.65, fourth highest in the Nation. These figures, of course, are exclusive of the debts of Philadelphia and other local units of the Commonwealth.

While the Federal, State, and local debts sound a warning to curb nondefense spending all along the line, they tell another interesting side story of the voracious growth of the Central Government in Washington, compared with the growth of the State and city governments.

That had been the general pattern of the country through most of its history.

World War I reversed the situation. By 1922, 69 percent of governmental debt was Federal, only 27.5 percent was local, and State debt was a mere 3.5 percent.

In 1902, for example, the Federal debt was only 35 percent of the total governmental debt. State debt was only 8 percent of the total, and local debt was 57 percent.

Today more than 91.5 percent of all governmental debt in this country has been run up by the Federal branch.

The bulk of this, of course, is due to the cost of the Second World War. But a very substantial part may be charged to the fact that the Government at Washington has been moving in continually upon functions which formerly belonged to the towns and States.

There are experts here who foresee the passing of the State governments as this country has always known them unless the trend is halted.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the minority leader if he is prepared to file at this time a list of committee assignments.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, we are not prepared today to file such a list. I might say to the distinguished Senator that the reason for that is that we have conference rules, and one of the rules provides that if matters of organization are to be brought up, such as the appointment of members of committees, or the size of committees, notice is required. I am perfectly frank to say that the earliest possible moment of filing such a list will be Thursday of this week. I want to make a forthright statement in that connection and recite the exact situation.

Mr. McFARLAND. I have no objection, but I should like to say to the minority leader that there has been no delay in the Senate by reason of the fact that the President made his address today. The majority will wait to file its committee assignments until the minority leader has filed his, and I propose to suggest that the Senate take a recess until next Thursday.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, let me say that the minority has been attempting to use the talent and ability which we find available. There have come to the Senate new Senators whom we desire to put to work without their serving an apprenticeship of 2, 4, or 6 years before they are advanced to membership on important committees, so they can render real service. I should like to say to my friend the majority leader, that we attempted to do this by suggesting that both sides change the number of members of committees. As an illustration, I may say that it seems to me there is not a Senator present who will not agree that there is nowhere near the amount of work in connection with the Committee on the District of Columbia as there is in connection with the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Banking and Currency, or the Committee on the Judiciary. We attempted to decrease the number of Senators on the committees on which Senators have not asked for service. It is felt that if a reduction could be made from 13 to 11 members in the case of the District Committee, for instance, and an increase made in the membership of the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Appropriations, the Senate of the United States would have the benefit of the ability of the Senators who have recently become Members of the Senate, and could carry on its work more efficiently. We were unable to do that on a voluntary basis. Therefore, Mr. President, we must iron out our committee appointments under the existing rules. As I said before, the earliest possible date when the minority can do it will be sometime on Thursday.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I was not making any statement in criticism of the distinguished minority leader or of the minority. I wish to work along with them, and I am willing to wait. It is perfectly satisfactory to wait until Thursday, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his observations. I did not feel that he was criticizing anyone. I merely wanted to make my explanation as to why the minority would not be ready until Thursday. I had hoped that we would be able to iron out applications that have been made for committee assignments to what I call the important committees.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON THE STATE OF THE UNION

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, never before has representative government in these United States been reduced to such a spectacle.

Congress has now heard the President's state of the Union message.

In the midst of America's gravest crisis the President of the United States has been reduced to the role of a mouthpiece and errand boy for an international superstate which has already fastened such a strangle hold on us that it is squeezing out our resources and our very lifeblood.

Again I want to warn my fellow Americans that until this stranglehold of foreign parasites over our own destiny is broken, we shall continue to finance our suicide as a free people.

The tragedy is, Mr. President, that the President of the United States has maneuvered us into such a desperate predicament that he does not dare to tell the American people the truth.

Instead, he uses his office of high trust to continue deceiving himself, the American people and even our so-called allies.

The only ones he cannot deceive are Stalin and his puppets.

The root of this deception, Mr. President, lies in President Truman's continued insistence that he has not blundered, tricked, or betrayed us into a war; but that, instead, we—and I am quoting him—"are simply carrying out our obligations to the United Nations in the Far East."

Mr. President, this is merely another illustration of the technique used by our leadership during these tragic years, based on what I call, "the bigger the blunder, the bigger the lie."

And, this monstrous deception must now be finally and completely exposed.

It is obvious, Mr. President, that Congress alone can now put an end to this frightful fraud, and this Congress had best put an end to it within the next few months.

If the Members of Congress have a shred of courage and patriotism left, they will lay down an ultimatum to the President, demanding either a declaration of war or the bringing back of American GI's to home shores. It is absurd to call it a police action and to say that we are not at war.

The need for this action, Mr. President becomes more apparent with every passing hour.

If it is true that we are only engaged in what President Truman continues to describe a "police action" and "an obligation to the United Nations," then we have already been committed to permanent war all over the globe, to be undertaken at the whim and fancy of one man and we have already lost even the right to defend ourselves.

For, Mr. President, war is only an extension, by force, of national policies and national objectives.

Its purpose is not to make "the world safe for democracy" or to impose the four freedoms at the point of a bayonet all around the globe.

Its primary reason for existence is to defend a nation's capacity to defend itself and preserve freedom.

It is no wonder President Truman says we are not at war; for his ordering American GI's into Korea had neither Congressional sanction, constitutional sanction, nor United Nations sanction, and if it is permitted to become a precedent, this Government has already been reduced and degraded to military dictatorship, and the essence and form of representative government is gone from the face of the earth.

The hypocrisy of President Truman is unmatched in America's history; for he continues to insist we are not at war in face of the casualty list to which I now refer.

I quote from the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, January 2, 1951, from an article by Peter Edson, titled "Korea and World War I":

The United States was in World War I only 19 months—April 1917 to November 1918.

In the first 6 months of that war only about 15,000 United States troops got to France.

First United States troops went into the line only on October 21, 1917—7 months after war was declared.

So United States troops were at the front only a year and 22 days.

The United States First Division did not get into the line as a full combat division until April 25, 1918.

So there was a United States front for only the last 200 days—or less than 7 months of war.

This is where the Korean War begins to take on the proportions of World War I.

United States casualties in Korea, confirmed to December 22—

And there are many more now—included 6,432 killed and died of wounds; 27,012 wounded; and 5,571 missing.

Total casualties for nearly 6 months, 38,015.

By comparison total American casualties in World War I were 50,000 battle deaths, 57,000 deaths from disease, 205,000 wounded, and 46 finally reported missing in action.

As another illustration, Mr. President, of the enormity of the President's hypocrisy, I call to mind the $17,500,000,000 which already has been requested by the President and the anticipated $75,000,000,000 budget for next year, which is designed to pay the cost of backing up this alleged police action.

This is not war, the President says, in face of the fact that my distinguished colleague from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], one of America's greatest authorities on Federal budgetary and fiscal problems, warned December 29, 1950, that these demands, unless reduced to essentials, face this country with financial chaos and ultimate disaster.

I am sure the American people have not forgotten Lenin's prophecy that he would force America to spend herself into bankruptcy. I ask, Mr. President, what simpler means for fulfilling this purpose can the Communists find than through a series of terrible Korean wars which an American President laughs off as police action in international brawls that break out spasmodically in the four corners of the earth. Senators heard the President's message today. We are going all over the world to stop this thing. The timetable is set by Stalin. Indochina will be next, and then probably Formosa. But it is not war. It is only police action.

Mr. President, there is also what the President would laugh off as the insignificant police action destruction which has led to a scorched earth policy in the middle of a deadly winter which forced our own command to fly 17,000 wounded and frost-bitten American GI's out of the Korean death trap and which has turned loose 10,000,000 homeless, starving, helpless people in one of the most pathetic and tragic death marches in history.

I wonder what the rest of the world, looking at Korea, is saying. I wonder if the Koreans themselves are not saying, "We might have survived Russian occupation, but we do not know whether we can survive being liberated by our friends the Americans in this police action." The country is devastated. There are 10,000,000 people helpless and starving. That is the price they have paid for our part in the police action.

Then there is the frightening fact of the transformation of the American economic and social system into the engine of military destruction which is now under way and going full blast.

The President would never dare tell how far reaching his plans are for taking over America; and Congress continues to rubber stamp blindly the outlines of separate pieces of this mass-mobilization puzzle, which are being fitted together by the National Security Council as parts of a detailed top-secret study of this country's global strategy.

Can any Member of the Senate honestly say that he has even seen this top-secret plan No. 68 which calls for the projection of the so-called Korean police action to the rest of the globe?

Mr. President, I now come to the final proof of the degrading spectacle to which representative government has been reduced in this country.

For we need not extend the so-called Korean police action any further to discover that the President of the United States is caught in such a hopeless trap that to save his political face he is determined to continue turning the world into an international graveyard for American GI's even if it means the continued killing of American youth to fill it.

Mr. President, I know of no other instance in history of a free people having permitted their elected leaders to carry on such a wanton, senseless, brutal, useless destruction of the flower of their youth, their own flesh and blood. No free people have ever stood silently by for so long and watched the blood of their youth so senselessly poured out.

Mr. President, behind the despicable propaganda about what a triumphant retreat is being conducted in Korea by American fighting men, in face of overwhelming odds, lies the outrageous, treasonable fact that our boys cannot even bomb the source of supply and power of their deadly enemies because they are being used as puppets by a bunch of international gangsters and parasites in the United Nations under whose directives our own boys are fighting and dying.

Meanwhile, Mr. President, as the rout continues and the senseless destruction and killing goes on, the "cease-fire commission," set up by the United Nations finally reports the complete failure of its mission, and its complete inability to make any recommendations for future action.

Yet, on Thursday, January 4, 1951, President Truman told the American people that he would make no recommendations for future action against Communist China to save our own American GI's until the United Nations, which has admitted its impotence and bankruptcy, acts first.

Meanwhile, Mr. President, the inhumanity of the President of the United States toward American GI's becomes barbaric.

Civilized nations have always drafted rules and regulations for the protection of the physical and mental health and the fighting morale of their menfolk, upon whose ability to fight a nation's ability to exist depends.

Yet, the President of the United States today continues to serve as a puppet for the war-breeding, inhuman absurdity called the United Nations, while American GI's continue to fight, suffer, and die under inhuman conditions.

Mr. President, what must happen to the American youth to arouse the American people to the manner and extent to which they continue to be betrayed?

Our own military experts admit that in modern warfare a division can stand intense high-level combat for 30 days at the most.

Think of it, Mr. President. Up to this moment American youth has been forced to endure the horrors of front-line combat for from 3 to 5 months at a stretch without relief, and General MacArthur is fighting desperately to save American GI's from the folly of the political leadership which has produced this catastrophe.

Yet, General MacArthur has been informed by this administration that he can expect no more reinforcements or replacements.

I have never been so completely convinced that if Congress does not act to remedy this frightful situation and to call the President's hand, we shall dishonor ourselves as Americans and for all time prove ourselves unworthy to represent a free people.

Again, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to take a stand. There are two courses before us if we are to maintain our integrity and our sovereignty as a free people. We must either declare war against the forces which under the protection of the United Nations are murdering our youth or bring our boys home.

RECESS TO THURSDAY

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Thursday next.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished majority leader will withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. McFARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Can the Senator from Arizona tell the Senate what the program will be when the Senate reconvenes on Thursday?

Mr. McFARLAND. I hope the minority will have its committee lists ready by that time, and that the committee assignments can be made. Today we have had the message from the President, and the order of the introduction of bills has been followed. The Senate is ready to begin work. That will be one of the principal objectives.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I know that is the hope of the minority.

Mr. McFARLAND. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Thursday, January 11, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou eternal God, our Father, we rejoice that in Thee our baffled minds and burdened hearts may find shelter and safety, serenity and strength.

Grant that in all the difficult tasks and perplexing problems of each new day we may have the interpreting and guiding light of Thy divine spirit.

May we be numbered among the believing souls who are impervious to all thoughts and feelings of cynicism and fear, assured and confident that Thy holy will and purposes cannot be thwarted or defeated.

We pray that we may never accept and endure our hardships and trials in the spirit of sullen or passive resignation but may we be enabled by Thy grace to transform them into blessings, bringing us nearer unto Thee.

Inspire us with fidelity and diligence in our high vocation of lifting the life of humanity into the loftier altitudes of amity and peace. May we be true for there are those who trust us; may we be strong for there are heavy burdens to carry; may we be courageous for there is much to do and dare.

Hear us in the name of our blessed Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 4, 1951, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 1. Concurrent resolution fixing the hour of meeting of the two Houses of Congress for the purpose of receiving the President's message.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares a recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker, at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.

JOINT SESSION OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE (HELD PURSUANT TO H. CON. RES. 1) TO HEAR AN ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

At 12 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the Vice President and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and its Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. On the part of the House the Chair appoints as members of the committee to escort the President of the United States into the Chamber the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate the Chair appoints as members of the committee to escort the President of the United States into the Chamber the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

The Doorkeeper announced the Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them.

The Doorkeeper announced the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

The members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 1 o'clock the Doorkeeper announced the President of the United States.

The President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and stood at the Clerk's desk. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress: I have the distinguished honor of presenting to you the President of the United States. [Applause, the Members rising.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 1)

The PRESIDENT. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress, this Eighty-second Congress faces as grave a task as any Congress in the history of our Republic.

The actions you take will be watched by the whole world. These actions will measure the ability of a free people, acting through their chosen representatives and their free institutions, to meet a deadly challenge to their way of life.

We can meet this challenge foolishly or wisely. We can meet it timidly or bravely, shamefully or honorably.

I know that the Eighty-second Congress will meet this challenge in a way worthy of our great heritage. I know that your debates will be earnest, responsible, and to the point. I know that from these debates there will come the great decisions needed to carry us forward.

At this critical time, I am glad to say that our country is in a healthy condition. Our democratic institutions are sound and strong. We have more men and women at work than ever before. We are able to produce more than ever before—in fact, far more than any country ever produced in the history of the world.

I am confident that we can succeed in the great task that lies before us.

We will succeed, but we must all do our part. We must all act together as citizens of this great Republic.

As we meet here today, American soldiers are fighting a bitter campaign in Korea.

We pay tribute to their courage, devotion, and gallantry.

Our men are fighting, alongside their United Nations allies, because they know, as we do, that the aggression in Korea is part of the attempt of the Russian Communist dictatorship to take over the world, step by step.

Our men are fighting a long way from home, but they are fighting for our lives and our liberties. They are fighting to protect our right to meet here today—our right to govern ourselves as a free nation.

The threat of world conquest by Soviet Russia endangers our liberty and endangers the kind of world in which the free spirit of man can survive. This threat is aimed at all peoples who strive to win or defend their own freedom and national independence.

Indeed, the state of our Nation is in great part the state of our friends and allies throughout the world. The gun that points at them points at us, also.

The threat is a total threat and the danger is a common danger.

All free nations are exposed and all are in peril. Their only security lies in banding together. No one nation can find protection in a selfish search for a safe haven from the storm.

The free nations do not have any aggressive purpose. We want only peace in the world—peace for all countries. No threat to the security of any nation is concealed in our plans or programs.

We had hoped that the Soviet Union, with its security assured by the Charter of the United Nations, would be willing to live and let live. But, I am sorry to say, that has not been the case.

The imperialism of the Czars has been replaced by the even more ambitious, more crafty, and more menacing imperialism of the rulers of the Soviet Union.

This new imperialism has powerful military forces. It is keeping millions of men under arms. It has a large air force and a strong submarine force. It has complete control of the men and equipment of its satellites. It has kept its subject peoples and its economy in a state of perpetual mobilization.

The present rulers of the Soviet Union have shown that they are willing to use this power to destroy the free nations and win domination over the whole world.

The Soviet imperialists have two ways of going about their destructive work. They use the method of subversion and internal revolution, and they use the method of external aggression. In preparation for either of these methods of attack, they stir up class strife and disorder. They encourage sabotage. They put out poisonous propaganda. They deliberately try to prevent economic improvement.

If their efforts are successful, they foment a revolution, as they did in Czechoslovakia and China, and as they tried unsuccessfully to do in Greece. If their methods of subversion are blocked, and if they think they can get away with outright warfare, they resort to external aggression. This is what they did when they loosed the armies of their puppet states against the Republic of Korea, in an evil war by proxy.

We of the free world must be ready to meet both of these methods of Soviet action. We must not neglect one or the other.

The free world has power and resources to meet these two forms of aggression—resources that are far greater than those of the Soviet dictatorship. We have skilled and vigorous peoples, great industrial strength, and abundant sources of raw materials. And above all, we cherish liberty. Our common ideals are a great part of our strength. These ideals are the driving force of human progress.

The free nations believe in the dignity and worth of man.

We believe in independence for all nations.

We believe that free and independent nations can band together into a world order based on law. We have laid the cornerstone of such a peaceful world in the United Nations.

We believe that such a world order can and should spread the benefits of modern science and industry, better health and education, more food and rising standards of living throughout the world.

These ideals give our cause a power and vitality that Russian communism can never command.

The free nations, however, are bound together by more than an ideal. They are a real community bound together also by the ties of self-interest and self-preservation. If they should fall apart, the results would be fatal to human freedom.

Our own national security is deeply involved with that of the other free nations. While they need our support, we equally need theirs. Our national safety would be gravely prejudiced if the Soviet Union were to succeed in harnessing to its war machine the resources and the manpower of the free nations on the borders of its empire.

If Western Europe were to fall to Soviet Russia, it would double the Soviet supply of coal and triple the Soviet supply of steel. If the free countries of Asia and Africa should fall to Soviet Russia, we would lose the sources of many of our most vital raw materials, including uranium, which is the basis of our atomic power. And Soviet command of the manpower of the free nations of Europe and Asia would confront us with military forces which we could never hope to equal.

In such a situation, the Soviet Union could impose its demands on the world, without resort to conflict, simply through the preponderance of its economic and military power. The Soviet Union does not have to attack the United States to secure domination of the world. It can achieve its ends by isolating us and swallowing up all our allies. Therefore, even if we were craven enough, and I do not believe that we could be—I say even if we were craven enough to abandon our ideals, it would be disastrous for us to withdraw from the community of free nations.

We are the most powerful single member of this community, and we have a special responsibility. We must take the leadership in meeting the challenge to freedom and in helping to protect the rights of independent nations.

This country has a practical, realistic program of action for meeting this challenge.

First, we shall have to extend economic assistance, where it can be effective. The best way to stop subversion by the Kremlin is to strike at the roots of social injustice and economic disorder. People who have jobs, homes, and hopes for the future will defend themselves against the underground agents of the Kremlin. Our programs of economic aid have done much to turn back communism.

In Europe, the Marshall plan has had electrifying results. As European recovery progressed, the strikes led by the Kremlin's agents in Italy and France failed. All over Western Europe, the Communist Party took worse and worse beatings at the polls.

The countries which have received Marshall-plan aid have been able, through hard work, to expand their productive strength—in many cases, to levels higher than ever before in their history. Without this strength, they would be completely incapable of defending themselves today. They are now ready to use this strength in helping to build a strong combined defense against aggression. [Applause.]

We shall need to continue some economic aid to European countries. This aid should now be specifically related to the building of their defenses.

In other parts of the world, our economic assistance will need to be more broadly directed toward economic development. In the Near East, in Africa, in Asia, we must do what we can to help people who are striving to advance from misery, poverty, and hunger. We must also continue to help the economic growth of our good neighbors in this hemisphere. These actions will bring greater strength for the free world. They will give many people a real stake in the future and reason to defend their freedom. They will mean increased production of the goods they need and the materials we need.

Second, we shall need to continue our military assistance to countries which want to defend themselves. [Applause.]

The heart of our common defense effort is the North Atlantic community. The defense of Europe is the basis for the defense of the whole free world—ourselves included. Next to the United States, Europe is the largest workshop in the world. It is also a homeland of great religious beliefs shared by many of our citizens—beliefs which are now threatened by the tide of atheistic communism.

Strategically, economically, and morally the defense of Europe is part of our own defense. [Applause.]

That is why we have joined with the countries of Europe in the North Atlantic treaty, pledging ourselves to work with them.

There has been much discussion recently over whether the European countries are willing to defend themselves. Their actions are answering this question.

Our North Atlantic treaty partners have strict systems of universal military training. Several have recently increased the term of service. All have taken measures to improve the quality of training. Forces are being trained and expanded as rapidly as the necessary arms and equipment can be supplied from their factories and ours. Our North Atlantic treaty partners, together, are building armies bigger than our own. [Applause.]

None of the North Atlantic treaty countries, including our own country, has done enough yet. But real progress is being made.

Together, we have worked out defense plans. The military leaders of our own country took part in working out these plans, and are agreed that they are sound and within our capabilities.

To put these plans into action, we sent to Europe last week one of our greatest military commanders, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower. [Applause.]

General Eisenhower went to Europe to assume command of the united forces of the North Atlantic Treaty countries, including our own forces in Germany.

The people of Europe have confidence in General Eisenhower. They know his ability to put together a fighting force of allies. His mission is vital to our security. We should all stand behind him, and give him every bit of help we can. [Applause.]

Part of our job will be to reinforce the military strength of our European partners by sending them weapons and equipment as our military production expands.

Our program of military assistance extends to the nations of the Near East and the Far East which are trying to defend their freedom. Soviet communism is trying to make these nations into colonies, and to use their people as cannon fodder in new wars of conquest. We want their people to be freemen and to enjoy peace.

Our country has always stood for freedom for the peoples of Asia. Long, long ago we stood for the freedom of the peoples of Asia. Our history shows this. We have demonstrated it in the Philippines. We have demonstrated it in our relations with Indonesia, India, and China. We hope to join in restoring the people of Japan to membership in the community of free nations.

It is in the Far East that we have taken up arms, under the United Nations, to preserve the principle of independence for free nations. We are fighting to keep the forces of Communist aggression from making a slave state out of Korea.

Korea has tremendous significance for the world. It means that free nations, acting through the United Nations, are fighting together against aggression.

We will understand the importance of this best if we look back into history. If the democracies had stood up against the invasion of Manchuria in 1931, or the attack on Ethiopia in 1935, or the seizure of Austria in 1938, if they had stood together against aggression on those occasions as the United Nations has done, the whole history of our time would have been different.

The principles for which we are fighting in Korea are right and just. They are the foundations of collective security and of the future of free nations. Korea is not only a country undergoing the torment of aggression; it is also a symbol. It stands for right and justice in the world against oppression and slavery. The free world must always stand for these principles—and we will stand with the free world. [Applause.]

As the third part of our program, we will continue to work for peaceful settlements of international disputes. We will support the United Nations and remain loyal to the great principles of international cooperation laid down in its Charter.

We are willing, as we have always been, to negotiate honorable settlements with the Soviet Union. But we will not engage in appeasement. [Applause.]

The Soviet rulers have made it clear that we must have strength as well as right on our side. If we build our strength—and we are building it—the Soviet rulers may face the facts and lay aside their plans to take over the world.

That is what we hope will happen, and that is what we are trying to bring about.

That is the only realistic road to peace.

These are the main elements of the course our Nation must follow as a member of the community of free nations. These are the things we must do to preserve our security and help create a peaceful world. But they will be successful only if we increase the strength of our own country.

Here at home we have some very big jobs to do. We are building much stronger military forces—and we are building them fast. We are preparing for full wartime mobilization, if that should be necessary. And we are continuing to build a strong and growing economy, able to maintain whatever effort may be required for as long as necessary.

We are building our own Army, Navy, and Air Force to an active strength of nearly three and a half million men and women. We are stepping up the training of the reserve forces, and establishing more training facilities, so that we can rapidly increase our active forces far more on short notice.

We are going to produce all the weapons and equipment that such an armed force will need. Furthermore, we will make weapons for our allies, and weapons for our own reserve supplies. On top of this, we will build the capacity to turn out on short notice arms and supplies that may be needed for a full scale war.

Fortunately, we have a good start on this because of our enormous plant capacity and because of the equipment on hand from the last war. For example, many combat ships are being returned to active duty from the "mothball fleet" and many others can be put into service on very short notice. We have large reserves of arms and ammunition and thousands of workers skilled in arms production.

In many cases, however, our stocks of weapons are low. In other cases, those on hand are not the most modern. We have made remarkable technical advances. We have developed new types of jet planes and powerful new tanks. We are concentrating on producing the newest types of weapons and producing them as fast as we possibly can.

This production drive is more selective than the one we had during World War II, but it is just as urgent and intense. It is a big program and it is a costly one.

Let me give you two concrete examples. Our present program calls for expanding the aircraft industry so that it will have the capacity to produce 50,000 modern military planes a year. We are preparing the capacity to produce 35,000 tanks a year. We are not now ordering that many planes or that many tanks, and we hope that we never have to, but we mean to be able to turn them out if we need them.

The planes we are producing now are much bigger—and much better—than the planes we had during the last war.

We used to think that the B–17 was a huge plane, and the blockbuster it carried a huge load. But the B–36 can carry five of those blockbusters in its belly, and it can carry them five times as far. Of course, the B–36 is much more complicated to build than the B–17, and far more expensive. One B–17 costs about $275,000, while now one B–36 costs about $3,500,000.

I ask you to remember that what we are doing is to provide the best and most modern military equipment in the world for our fighting forces.

This kind of defense production program has two parts.

The first part is to get our defense production going as fast as possible. We have to convert plants and channel materials to defense production.

This means heavy cuts in the civilian use of copper, aluminum, rubber, and other essential materials. It means shortages in various consumer goods.

The second part is to increase our capacity to produce and to keep our economy strong for the long pull. We do not know how long Communist aggression will threaten the world.

Only by increasing our output can we carry the burden of preparedness for an indefinite period in the future. This means that we will have to build more power plants, and more steel mills, grow more cotton, mine more copper, and expand our capacity in many other ways.

The Congress will need to consider legislation, at this session, affecting all the aspects of our mobilization job. The main subjects on which legislation will be needed are:

First, appropriations for our military build-up.

Second, extension and revision of the Selective Service Act.

Third, military and economic aid to help build up the strength of the free world.

Fourth, revision and extension of the authority to expand production and to stabilize prices, wages, and rents.

Fifth, improvement of our agricultural laws, to help obtain the kinds of farm products we need for the defense effort.

Sixth, improvement of our labor laws to help provide stable labor-management relations and to make sure that we have steady production in this emergency.

Seventh, housing and training of defense workers, and the full use of all our manpower resources.

Eighth, means for increasing the supply of doctors, nurses, and other trained medical personnel critically needed for the defense effort.

Ninth, aid to the States to meet the most urgent needs of our elementary and secondary schools. Some of our plans will have to be deferred for the time being. But we should do all we can to make sure our children are being trained as good and useful citizens in these critical times ahead.

Tenth, a major increase in taxes to meet the cost of the defense effort. [Applause.]

The Economic Report and the Budget message will discuss these subjects further. In addition, I shall send to the Congress special messages containing detailed recommendations on legislation needed at this session.

In the months ahead, the Government must give priority to activities that are urgent—like military procurement and atomic energy and power development. It must practice rigid economy in its nondefense activities. [Applause.] Many of the things we would normally do must be curtailed or postponed.

But in a long-term defense effort like this one, we cannot neglect the measures needed to maintain a strong economy and a healthy democratic society. [Applause.]

The Congress, therefore, should give continued attention to the measures which our country will need for the long pull. And it should act upon such legislation as promptly as circumstances permit.

To take just one example—we need to continue and complete the work of rounding out our system of social insurance. We still need to improve our protection against unemployment and old age. We still need to provide insurance against loss of earnings through sickness, and against the high costs of modern medical care.

Above all, we must remember that the fundamentals of our strength rest upon the freedoms of our people. We must continue our efforts to achieve the full realization of our democratic ideals. We must uphold freedom of speech and freedom of conscience in our land. We must assure equal rights and equal opportunities to all our citizens.

As we go forward this year in the defense of freedom, let us keep clearly before us the nature of our present effort.

We are building up our strength, in concert with other free nations, to meet the danger of aggression that has been turned loose on the world. The strength of the free nations is the world's best hope of peace.

I ask the Congress for unity in these crucial days.

Make no mistake about my meaning. I do not ask, or expect unanimity. I do not ask for an end to debate. Only by debate can we arrive at decisions which are wise, and which reflect the desires of the American people. We do not have dictatorship in this country, and we will never have one in this country. [Applause.]

When I request unity, what I am really asking for is a sense of responsibility on the part of every Member of this Congress. Let us debate the issues, but let every man among us weigh his words and deeds. There is a sharp difference between harmful citicism and constructive criticism. If we are truly responsible as individuals, I am sure that we will be unified as a Government.

Le us keep our eyes on the issues and work for the things we all believe in.

Let each of us put our country ahead of our party, and ahead of our own personal interests. [Applause.]

I had the honor to be a Member of the Senate during World War II, and I know from experience that unity of purpose and of effort is possible in the Congress without any lessening of the vitality of our two-party system.

Let us all stand together as Americans. And let us stand together with all men everywhere who believe in human liberty. [Applause.]

Peace is precious to us. It is the way of life we strive for with all the strength and wisdom we possess. But more precious than peace are freedom and justice. [Applause.] We will fight, if fight we must, to keep our freedom and to prevent justice from being destroyed.

These are the things that give meaning to our lives, and which we acknowledge to be greater than ourselves.

This is our cause—peace, freedom, justice.

We will pursue this cause with determination and humility, asking divine guidance that in all we do we may follow God's will. [Applause, the Members rising.]

At 1 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m., the President, accompanied by the committee of escort, retired from the hall of the House of Representatives.

The Doorkceper escorted the invited guests from the Chamber in the following order:

The members of the President's Cabinet.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

JOINT SESSION DISSOLVED

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the joint session of the two Houses now dissolved.

Thereupon (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the joint session of the two Houses was dissolved.

The Members of the Senate retired to their Chamber.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The House will stand in recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

(Thereupon, at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., the House stood in recess until 2 p. m.)

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, at 2 o'clock p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message of the President be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO HON. ROBERT CROSSER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the authority conferred upon him by House Resolution 1, he did, on Friday, January 5, 1951, administer the oath of office to the Honorable ROBERT CROSSER, at Bethesda, Md.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 47) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas ROBERT CROSSER, a Representative from the State of Ohio, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed to the oath of office before the Speaker, authorized by resolution of this House to administer the oath, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said ROBERT CROSSER as a Member of this House.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

Mr. MANSFIELD presented himself at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO HON. WILSON D. GILLETTE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

WYSOX, PA., January 4, 1951.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In accordance with your designation of me, pursuant to House Resolution 2, Eighty-second Congress, adopted by the House of Representatives, to administer the oath of office to Representative-elect WILSON D. GILLETTE, of the Fourteenth District of Pennsylvania, I have the honor to report that on the 4th day of January 1951, at Towanda, Bradford County, State of Pennsylvania, I administered the oath of office to Mr. GILLETTE, form prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being the form of oath administered to Members of the House of Representatives, to which Mr. GILLETTE subscribed.

I have the honor to be,
Yours respectfully,
JAMES L. FISHER,
Captain, USN, Retired, Justice of the Peace, Standing Stone Township (Bradford County), Wysox, Pa.

(My commission expires first Monday in January 1954.)

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 48) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas WILSON D. GILLETTE, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, from the Fourteenth District thereof, has been unable, from sickness, to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed to the oath of office before Capt. James L. Fisher, United States Navy, retired, and Justice of the Peace, Standing Stone Township, Bradford County, Wysox, Pa., authorized by resolution of this House to administer the oath, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said WILSON D. GILLETTE as a Member of this House.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH OF OFFICE TO HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 49) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas HOMER D. ANGELL, a Representative-elect from the State of Oregon, from the Third District thereof, has been unable to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker, or deputy named by him, be, and he is hereby, authorized to administer the oath of office to said HOMER D. ANGELL at Portland, Oreg., and that the said oath, when administered as herein authorized, shall be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said HOMER D. ANGELL.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the authority of House Resolution 49, Eighty-second Congress, the Chair appoints Hon. James A. Fee, United States district judge for the District of Oregon, to administer the oath of office to the Honorable HOMER D. ANGELL.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to address the House today for 15 minutes, following the legislative business and any other special orders heretofore entered.

ECA STEEL TO RED CHINA

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, the President in his state of the Union message today, told about the success of the Marshall plan as a means of helping to contain communistic expansionism throughout the world. Some Members of Congress, myself included, never have been so sure that hand-outs of American money and goods, on what has come to be almost a global scale, would assure the loyalty of other nations to our effort toward holding the line against Russia's territorial ambitions.

At any rate, here is a case in point. It offers an example of the utter lack of good faith, and the suicidal weakness and corruption, of at least one of the Western European nations, on which the Truman administration appears to believe we can depend, in the event of a Russian military move toward the west.

I refer to the fact, as revealed in a dispatch from Geneva, Switzerland, by John Barth, Chicago Daily News and Washington Star foreign correspondent, that French steelmakers are selling steel rails to Red China. The dispatch said that the agreement calls for 139,000 tons of rails, sufficient for a total of 450 miles of railway.

Not only was this agreement made, but it was made in the knowledge that the new railway would connect Kwangsi Province in China with the Indochina border. French troops now are fighting a losing battle to preserve French interests in Indochina. The new railway would be used to carry munitions to those Indochinese Communist forces with whom the French troops are engaged.

All of this, of course, is bad enough, although not without some precedent elsewhere in recent years. But it is not half so bad as the further factor that American taxpayers, through the Marshall plan, have made possible this betrayal by French steelmakers, not only of their own national interests, but of American interests as well.

An Economic Cooperation Administration press release, No. 1928, dated December 11, 1950, reveals that an expenditure of $8,218,000 in American tax money was authorized for building up the French steel industry. The money was to be spent for generators and motors, machinery and tools, and technical services.

In addition, an ECA report entitled "Trade With France" shows that between January 1, 1949, and January 1, 1950, this country shipped to France, at ECA expense, more than 92,528 metric tons of steel in various forms. These shipments, many of them comprising special alloy steels, consisted of scrap, blooms, bars, billets, strips, and 5,782 tons of steel rails.

Thus American taxpayers provided additional capacity for French steel mills, rails that might be used in France, while French-produced rails were sold to Red China, and a portion at least of the steel from which the rails for Red China might be manufactured.

If this is the kind of use we may expect to see made of American charity dollars, and if this is the measure of the French desire to help keep the free world free, then God help America in any conflict with Soviet Russia in which we may become involved on the European Continent.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to revise and extend my remarks and include some tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EX-PRESIDENT HOOVER'S DEFENSE THESIS

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a short newspaper excerpt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, in an address to the Nation, ex-President Herbert Hoover, from his world-wide wealth of experience, outlined a sensible, sane program for the safety and security of the United States in a war-weary, war-torn, war-threatened world. In substance, Mr. Hoover said that our first line of defense should be located neither in Europe nor in Asia, but should embrace the Western Hemisphere; that North America and South America, separated from the rest of the world by the width of the Atlantic Ocean and the Pacific Ocean, should constitute both our American sphere of influence and our first line of defense. With that thesis I am in full accord; in fact, I have been saying the same thing for over 10 years. Many Members of Congress have opposed the world-wide messianic program of both the Roosevelt and the Truman administrations, a program which requires our American boys to fight the battles of the rest of the world.

President Truman and his advisers until last spring considered Asia as of little or no importance to us from the standpoint of our national defense, so Asia was written off and was allowed to slip into Stalin's communistic sphere of influence. The whole Acheson-Lattimore-Hiss policy was based on the idea that China was expendable, and was not important to us in the struggle between communism on the one hand and American democracy on the other. Then overnight President Truman reversed himself, without consultation with either our military leaders or the Congress, and impulsively ordered General MacArthur to send American soldiers into Korea to drive back the North Korean Communists. This was done in the face of the fact that we had no heavy tanks, big guns, or war planes in that area, to speak of, for our boys to use, and also in the face of the fact that our military leaders advised that Korea, from a military standpoint, was not defendable.

President Truman, again without consulting Congress, now proposes to send 200,000 American boys into Europe to defend that continent from an expected Stalin invasion. According to our military experts Stalin with his immense war machine could within 6 weeks overrun the whole of Europe, and no force we could send to Europe could prevent it. Our atom bomb stockpile is the only deterrent Stalin fears. So again our boys are to be sent forth to be massacred in a futile attempt to protect our European neighbors.

Mr. Speaker, what is the world situation today? Must we not acknowledge that our efforts during the last 5 years to contain communism have resulted in complete failure? As I see the world situation today it is about as follows:

During World War II Stalin was dictator over 300,000,000 Russians. Today, 5 years later, he is dictator over 900,000,000 people. He has surrounded Russia with satellite nations, puppet nations, iron-curtain nations, until today Joe Stalin sits in Moscow like a big fat spider in the center of his web. He pulls a string and the flames of war break out in Korea, and we have to send our boys there and spend three or four billion dollars to put out the flames. Then he will pull a string in Indochina, in India, in Siam, in Turkey, in Greece, in Yugoslavia, or in Berlin, and the flames of war will break out, and again we will have to send our boys and spend billions of dollars to put out those war flames. After 3 or 4 years we will be exhausted, bled white; and Stalin, without losing a man of his own, will then be ready to take over.

During these same 5 years we have spent $100,000,000,000 to contain communism, to fence it in, to keep it from spreading. This we have termed a "cold war." It has been under the management of Dean Acheson, Alger Hiss, Owen Lattimore, Dr. Jessup, and others. Is it not about time to change our cold-war leaders and to place someone in charge of our interests in Asia that knows something about the situation there, someone like General MacArthur? We should get rid of Acheson, the man who got us into the present mess in Asia, and rely upon the advice of General MacArthur.

The situation in Korea today is the result of placing General MacArthur under the orders of the United Nations, and the UN has refused to follow his advice. They have prevented MacArthur from bombing the Communist Chinese troop concentrations and war supplies in Manchuria. General MacArthur has been forced to fight with one hand tied behind his back, an impossible position to be in, and American boys have died and are dying as a result. This situation has been brought about by our State Department's "panty waist" foreign policy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude my remarks with the following pertinent excerpt from Isbrandtsen's article on Nationalism that appeared in the Washington Times-Herald on January 3, 1951. It is a true picture of the position we are in.

The United Nations, a supergovernment, foisted upon us, has a mandate to deplete our resources, suck our strength and decide life or death of our people. We have been engineered into an inferiority complex of bowing to our wards and debtors. This lack of national pride was capitalized upon by a foreign directorate to furnish men, money, and material to carry on a war to perpetuate foreign interest at the cost of our own possible destruction or deterioration.

The cry goes out that the United States is in peril and vulnerable. This is a reality. From the United Nations comes the plea we must not quit in Korea. Korea, the graveyard of the flower of our Army. International leaders would risk an all-out war with Asia that they may survive at the cost of American life and treasure.

PAY OF 18-YEAR-OLD DRAFTEES

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, certain of the brass hat section have proposed that we draft 18-year-old boys and pay them $10 a month.

I want to go on record as being absolutely opposed to paying these boys only $10 a month. I maintain that if they are good enough to be drafted, these 18-year-olds ought to have full Army pay and full benefits. I think it is the most outrageous proposal I ever heard of. I am in favor of giving these boys full Army pay and retirement benefits if they are drafted. In addition to that, if 18-year-olds are drafted into the Armed Forces, they have every right to expect just as many privileges as older men already in service. I am unalterably opposed to any other treatment.

All of which gives rise to another question. Is this the plan of those in authority to lower the high standards within the armed services which we in Congress have worked so hard to obtain for our GI's?

I should hate to see adventurers capitalize on our presently insecure position and appeal through false patriotism to these young men who are so sincere, yet naive, and try to compel them to work for nothing.

We have not yet arrived at such a state of economic depravity that we have to ask 18-year-old boys to go into our Army and Navy and sacrifice all the emoluments which are today accepted as regular.

If our leaders expect to do this, they must also propose that the brass hats likewise serve for $10 a month and divest themselves of all privileges of rank and circumstance.

Let the generals, the admirals, and the other bigwigs make similar sacrifices to what they request of the 18-year-olds. Perhaps they would not be so anxious after that to press their case.

I am determined to see justice done to these youngsters if and when it becomes necessary to include them in the defense program.

COMMUNIST CHINESE AGGRESSION IN KOREA

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting two editorials in the Appendix today which I think every Member should read. Both are entitled to the same effect: "UN Up to the Test," "UN Must Act," from the New York Times and New York Herald Tribune. They deal with the fact that the United Nations has not yet taken action to condemn Communist Chinese aggression in Korea.

The least that the United Nations can do is to remain the world's moral force for peace and justice. The only way to do that now is to condemn as unqualifiedly for their aggression in Korea, the Chinese Communists, just as the North Koreans were so properly condemned when they undertook the unprovoked aggression against South Korea.

The United Nations remains mankind's best and perhaps last hope for peace. At this stage of its development it has been unable to muster enough of its members—with some notable exceptions—for the military support in Korea which should have been forthcoming to implement UN military sanctions. But that makes all the more important the retention of its position as the moral force for justice and peace in the world. In the matter of the UN condemning Chinese Communist aggression in Korea time is on the side of the aggressor.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. CANFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes today, following any special orders heretofore entered.

BEFORE WE ACHIEVE UNITY, WE MUST FIRST HAVE CLARITY

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the President's speech is a challenge to the Soviet Union. If our Government had been as vigorous and forthright in dealing with the threat of Soviet aggression 3 or 4 years ago, we should not be facing the present world crisis.

Unfortunately, the President did not see fit to consider the specific major questions which have already been raised. Are we prepared to use Chiang Kai-shek's forces? How much aid will Western Europe need to build her military defenses? What specific commitments have we already made to the North Atlantic Treaty nations? Here at home, does the administration intend to introduce rationing? What are the plans for combating the inflation which is already threatening?

These unanswered questions must be read against the background of American boys thrown into battle in Korea without equipment and without air protection. We have an obligation to the Nation to prevent recurrence of any such unpreparedness. There are still many questions unanswered after the President's speech. Before we achieve unity, we must have clarity.

SECRETARY OF DEFENSE MARSHALL

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, last Friday Secretary of Defense Marshall asserted publicly that the "situation in Korea is developing almost as anticipated."

That is an astounding statement, implying that Marshall and other high officials anticipated the heavy loss of American lives, evacuation, ultimate defeat, and practically no help on the ground from other members of the United Nations.

If Marshall and others knew what to "anticipate" in Korea why was the war launched in the first place?

Are we now going to be forced out of that area or are we going to be able to wage a successful holding action? If the latter, at what price in the lives of Americans; and where is the defense line to be established?

Other than the bare statement that the Korean situation is developing almost as anticipated, Marshall failed to amplify. The question is: Does Marshall actually know any more about this situation than he did about his whereabouts in the critical hours preceding Pearl Harbor?

Let us have the facts.

THE MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to one of the greatest messages ever delivered to a joint session of the Congress by a President of the United States.

It is a message of understanding and of appreciation; a message of recognition of the responsibility of all of us; one that also recognized the gravity of the world situation; one ringing with American thought, expression, and tradition.

It is a message of optimism, of confidence and of strength; a message to which we can all respond because it called for unity, recognizing that basic unity can exist without unanimity of opinion. It was a message calling for constructive criticism, if criticism is offered; a message that each and every one of us in positions of trust can read with interest in assuming our responsibilities of trust. I think I can safely say, based upon experience—and I hope the other Chamber will benefit by the fine example set by the Members of the House during the past years—that the National House of Representatives will meet the test, and any criticism that might be made from time to time will be on a high plane and on a plane that is consistent with the responsibility of the office that we all occupy in this body. Of course I cannot speak for the other body; I would not undertake to. However, I can express my own personal opinion about the membership of this House. Where there has been a difference of opinion we have always maintained a high level of debate, and I know that the unity of the membership of this body, in relation to the emergency, as evidenced in the past, will continue to manifest itself during this Congress.

But, Mr. Speaker, in any event, we have listened to one of the truly great messages of the entire constitutional history of our country; a message that has sunk into the minds of each and every one of us, and a message that, in accordance with our judgment and our conscience, we should and will respond to, not as Democrats, not as Republicans, not as Independents, but as Americans.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

WHY ARE AMERICANS BEING SLAUGHTERED IN KOREA?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, one primary reason is found in President Truman's July 19 message to Congress.

From that message we learn that, when the North Koreans invaded the Korean Republic, President Truman, without consulting the people or the Congress, ordered the American Armed Forces to fight. That meant war. War meant killing.

Thousands of our men have died, and they will continue to be slaughtered by the hundred thousand if President Truman and his advisers pursue their present foreign policy.

The real foundation for the slaughtering of our men in world war III was the program, even before 1942, of men like Charles Davis, Clarence Streit, Owen J. Roberts, John Foster Dulles, Russell W. Davenport, Harold L. Ickes, Gardner Cowles, Jr., and internationalist organizations to make us, through membership in an international organization, subservient to other nations, permit other nations to influence our national policy.

The proposed organization was named by some as "One World," by others as "United States of the World." Still others called it either "Federal Union, Inc.," "Union Now," or "World Fellowship, Inc."

The proponents of this ideology were politically, economically, and financially powerful. They and the editors, columnists, and commentators who supported their views proceed upon the assumption that all who oppose them do so from unworthy motives.

Their program and propaganda are based upon the premise that the creation of a world-wide supergovernment, where all people and nations would be united, where there would be no conflict of interests, would end all war.

That premise was false, as the lesson learned at the Tower of Babel and subsequent history demonstrates.

Only when people and nations forget their greed, selfishness, ambition, desire for security and freedom of action, will the people and the nations of the world live together in harmony.

But even on the most distant horizon there appears as yet no the slightest indication that the millennium is even approaching.

Let us be fair and charitable. We will assume that many of those advocating this over-all Government, which calls, at least in some degree, for the surrender of the individual's freedom of action, of the Republic's independence, were sincere and believed that it would bring peace to the world.

Nevertheless, again, as always in every proposed Utopia, there were, there are, greedy, selfish, ambitious, power-hungry individuals and nations.

Proof? Look at the record.

Our men and resources were the deciding factor in World War I—our avowed purpose the end of all war, to be accomplished by the defeat of what was then called Kaiser Wilhelm's imperialism. On foreign battlefields the blood of our men flowed like water. They froze in Siberia. Their bodies lie buried in cemeteries throughout the world. Their lives were sacrificed for an ideal which was unattainable.

In World War II, the declared purpose was the carrying of the Four Freedoms to all peoples throughout the world. Again, our men died, our resources were spent to stop Hitler and nazism, only to create a Frankenstein under Stalin. Our men suffered and died in the building of an easy road to the top of the mountain, where Stalin envisioned himself as the master of the world.

It was once Britain's proud boast that the sun never set on the British Flag. At the end of the fighting in World War II, it might truthfully be said that the setting sun never failed to illuminate a white cross marking the burial place of an American who had given his life in an effort to bring world peace.

The fighting in World War II at an end, revengeful individuals and groups exacted of the German people an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. Having destroyed—and it should have been destroyed—Hitler's political war-making machine; disarmed the German people—and they should have been disarmed—these individuals and groups still wanted their pound of flesh.

Unfortunately, in taking that pound of flesh, they destroyed not only the ability of Germany to rearm, but its ability to recover from war's ravages. They drained from the German people the lifeblood which today might have enabled them effectively and as our ally to present a united front to Stalin's Communists.

Nor was that all. At the behest of a trade-obsessed England and a fear-ridden France, we split the German people and we split their country; abandoned to Stalin's Communists Eastern Germany and millions of its young men and women.

Nor was that all, our State Department, into which had infiltrated Communists like Hiss; dominated by Acheson and others of his thinking; with ears attuned to British diplomacy, in part because of England's demands; in part, because of incompetency or worse, followed a policy of not only appeasing the Communists; but stopped Chiang Kai-shek's army in its tracks when it was winning its battle against the Communists with whom we are now at war.

Our men are being slaughtered because Mr. Truman (a) ordered them to fight in Korea; (b) sent the Seventh Fleet to bottle up Chiang Kai-shek's 500,000 trained fighting men in Formosa; (c) thus depriving our Armed Forces of their aid; (d) refused to encourage the almost 2,000,000 Chinese guerrillas on the mainland in their battle against the Communist armies.

In my humble judgment, it is folly—utter and complete folly—to permit our men to be sent to Europe to be butchered, after we have been warned that those nations for whom we are supposed to be fighting will not go all out in such a war.

The executive departments in Mr. Truman's administration, all under his control, ever since the fighting ceased, have been permitting the shipment from our shores of munitions of war to Russia, which either have been or will be, in the event of war, used against our men.

England and France have a 20-year nonaggression treaty with Russia, which, by its terms, precludes them giving full aid to us.

Moreover, England, through Hong Kong, has been supplying the Chinese Communists with copper and other raw materials which can be used for war.

Great Britain, in the first 11 months of 1950, shipped 9,878 tons of vital strategic raw rubber to the Soviet Union. That is more than 20 times the amount exported to Russia during the same period in 1949.

In fact, Britain furnished Russia more raw rubber, which a nation must have if it is to successfully carry on a war, than Russia imported in 1948 and 1949.

France has sold war materials to Red China, one of the latest deals being for 139,000 tons of steel rails—sufficient to lay 450 miles of track to carry supplies to the Reds who are fighting the French.

Worse yet, with the full approval of the administration's authority in Germany, West Germany has supplied East Germany, under the direct control of Russia, 13,000 tons of steel rails. Over those rails Stalin's army and supplies for that army will flow into West Germany, if and when Stalin moves from the east.

Do not the foregoing facts show the folly of sending 200,000 Americans to Europe? Why fight alone for nations which will not help?

Reliable information tells us that a common expression on the streets, in the pubs—yes, even in the Parliament—of Britain is "Let America fight her own war." Are we in Europe to fight alone?

President Truman stubbornly refuses to use the military might of Spain, because, it is said, during World War II Franco did not actively oppose nazism. We ourselves did not then oppose—we fought side by side with—Stalin and his Communists.

Is it better that more and ever more Americans be slaughtered in Korea and probably in Europe, or that the 500,000 Chinese, the 2,000,000 or more guerrillas in China, the Spanish Army or all others who will aid in the battle, be turned loose on Stalin's hordes?

The Pentagon is reported to have said that the Army's operations in Korea were proceeding "as planned." No one with any sense believes that statement.

Certainly, the Pentagon did not "plan" that our Armed Forces should drive north from the southern tip of Korea—thousands of them sacrifice their lives, and then be forced back to their original starting point or even completely out of Korea.

The situation in Korea is desperate, if not hopeless. Yet, on January 3, at Lake Success, according to the United Press, Warren R. Austin, our representative, told the United Nations political committee that the United States intends to "fight on in Korea."

For what? With what? And how long, may we ask? Until MacArthur's force has been completely destroyed?

When, if ever, will Mr. Austin, his associates in United Nations, and the internationalists here in the Nation's Capital learn that there is a limit to what our men can do?

Has Mr. Austin forgotten that his first duty is to the United States of America, not to the United Nations?

EUROPE

What of Europe?

Having deprived Germany of its ability to successfully oppose Stalin, where again, if military information is accurate, our men will be hopelessly outnumbered, have no fair chance of successfully opposing any attempt by Russia to overcome Western Europe.

We are now told that 200,000 Americans are to be sent to fight in Europe. We have also been told by military experts and others that Stalin can overrun Western Europe in from 30 to 60 days. Are we to sacrifice another American Army in Europe?

Mr. Truman is a determined man. He is an egotistical man. And it is evident that, if he is unchecked, he will continue to follow the policy of the Achesons, of the internationalists, regardless of its effect upon the security of this country.

At his press conference on the 4th, he told the reporters that he did not need authority from Congress to send additional troops to Europe.

Despite the fact that thousands of our men have been slaughtered, the President still insists, and he so told the reporters on the 4th, that we were not in a war; that we were simply carrying out our obligations to the United Nations in the Far East.

What of the President's obligation to the people of this country? What of his duty to so shape our national policy as to make secure the future of our Nation?

What consideration, what encouragement, is it to young Americans who may enlist, who may be drafted? To the fathers and the mothers, the wives, the brothers, and the sisters of those fine, young Americans who have been killed in Korea to now learn that those boys were not fighting for the United States, nor even for United Nations?

Was Mr. Truman in his right mind when he said, as he did say on last Thursday, as he has insisted all along, that we are not in a war?

Were the thousands of men who have died in Korea not fighting a war? Were they only doing police duty?

If Mr. Truman believes that we are not engaged in a war, then he has been guilty of a most despicable fraud and deception, for time and again he has called for our men to lay down their lives, for the taxpayers to supply billions upon billions of dollars, because, he said, by his requests, the country was in great danger; that the men and the dollars were necessary to prevent Stalin and the Communists taking over our country; that we were at war.

Mr. Truman's demands for the drafting of men, for the appropriation of money, have been based upon the theory that our country, through war, was threatened with disaster. Now he says there is no war, just a police action.

Unless Mr. Truman is prevented from following the policy of the Achesons and the internationalists, he will strip us of our manpower, of our ability to defend ourselves, leave us as a Nation helpless, open to conquest by Stalin.

What can the average citizen do to prevent this disaster?

Mr. Truman refuses to carry out the will of the people as expressed at the last election. There will be no opportunity to vote him out of office until 1952.

The Congress, even though it knows the will of the people, refuses to actively, vigorously, effectively oppose him.

Unless the people, in overwhelming numbers, insist upon a sound American policy, the President will continue his mad course.

But one remedy seems left open to the people. That is this: Write scorching letters to the President and to those Senators and Congressmen who have so little faith in our form of government, in the ability, courage, and endurance of our people, that they believe we are utterly dependent upon some foreign nation or nations for our national security.

Advise the President and your Representative that it is time to conserve our manpower, our resources; put an end to wastefulness and sinful spending by our National Government. That it is time to follow the advice of Herbert Hoover and Joseph P. Kennedy, by putting into effect the desires of an overwhelming number of our people that we keep our Nation free from foreign entanglements and wholeheartedly devote ourselves to making secure our Nation here in the Western Hemisphere.

That objective can only be attained if we insist upon getting our men out of Korea, if any are there as this is written; refuse to sacrifice in Europe the men and resources necessary for our own national security.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. BENDER. I am very happy that the gentleman is bringing these matters to the attention of the country on the floor of the Congress. I commend the gentleman for speaking out. During the last 2 years that I have not been a Member of this body, I have rebuked myself many times for not having asked more questions. I think we should have unity—we owe that to our country, but we must have clarity before we have unity. We must understand what we are doing and we must have the courage as representatives of the people to speak out. We have a man from Ohio in the Capitol who spoke out and he was elected by the biggest vote that any man ever received running for office in the State because he did have the courage to speak out.

During the next 2 years I hope we will have the courage to do what the gentleman from Michigan is doing right now.

ARMED SERVICES PAY

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. If that is agreeable to the gentlemen who have previous orders, without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL] made reference to the proposed draft of 18-year-olds and also made reference to some statement by someone to the effect that they should be paid $10 per month. I have seen a statement quoting General Eisenhower as having said that there should be some distinction between the pay of a career soldier and the pay of a man who is drafted for a relatively short period of time or for the duration of a war. I do not know what General Eisenhower may have said, but as chairman of the subcommittee which wrote the recent pay bill, I want to assure you that our attitude has always been that a man in the service should be paid for the service rendered, and the responsibility assumed. A man who enters the service for the purpose of rendering service is entitled to all the pay and emoluments that anyone else is entitled to receive.

Our entire Career Compensation Act was based upon the idea that every man should be paid on one basis and one basis only, and that is the service rendered and the responsibility assumed.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. The country will applaud the statement the gentleman from Texas has just made. I think it is a very commendable statement.

Mr. KILDAY. I can assure the gentleman that that is the theory of compensation to the members of the armed services.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

ARMY DEMANDS ITS SHARE OF BEST FIGHTING MEN

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, we need more men to add muscle to the thin frame of our military manpower.

The Selective Service System will soon reach out to gather in many younger registrants, and some older ones.

No one will question the necessity of this. A realistic appraisal of the world situation leaves us no other choice. Our people expect positive action on the part of their Representatives to make up for the deficit in defense.

We are united in our determination to lead from strength rather than weakness in our opposition to aggression.

That being the case, we recognize that selective service, or the draft of suitable manpower for the protection of this Nation, is essential.

In spite of some favoritism concerning individuals and occupations, that method functioned as well as could be expected during World War II.

Bear in mind that we then had a Secretary of War and a Secretary of the Navy, as the respective heads of two separate defense establishments. For one whole year after December 7, 1941, we employed the dual device of voluntary enlistment sparked by the forced draft of selective service to beef up the Army and the Air Force which was then subordinate to it. Meanwhile, the Navy, Coast Guard, and Marines siphoned off the "cream of the crop" because they had the psychological advantage of seeking only elite volunteers. This exclusiveness, which sharpened the distinction between volunteer and draftee, took away from the Army its proportionate share of the best personnel.

That same discrimination is at work now, even though the Army, the Navy, with the Marines, and the Air Force, are supposed to be brother services under the one unified Department of Defense.

As the draft for the Army nears, the registrants flock to the Navy, Marine, and Air Force recruiting stations partly on the theory that they are exercising the individual freedom of choice in preference to compulsion.

In this lopsided competition for manpower, we fail to see evidence of the balanced teamwork that we had in mind when we voted for unification of the Armed Forces.

The Army, which is called upon to do the bulk of the fighting, and under the worst possible conditions, as in Korea, is not getting its proportionate quota of those who are mentally and physically fit.

The Selective Service System is a misnomer. The Navy, the Marines, and Air Force do the selecting, picking the best among those who come forward to volunteer. The Army, at the end of the manpower line, takes what is left through the draft.

Of more than 40,000 casualties suffered by the United States in Korea, close to 90 percent of this sacrifice has been borne by the Army. For fear of offending the feelings of the enemy, the official spokesmen of our Government avoid any mention of war. As if pain and misery and death can be glossed over as something less than agony by referring to the grim operation as a mere "police action." Meanwhile, as some appeasers in the United Nations forfeit principle and try to arrange a deal with the aggressors, preparing to give in to international blackmail by some face-saving formula that will hide their base surrender, our mainstay, the Army, is not getting the proper replacements and reinforcements that it requires.

Day in and day out, it is the foot soldier who is called upon for strength and stamina of the highest order. His weapons are becoming more complex, and the varied tasks he must do in the field demand intelligence and initiative This has been one of the lessons we should have learned in Korea. As an appalling number of junior officers have been killed or wounded, the noncoms and men in the ranks have been forced to go it alone. This imposes upon them the extra burden of greater resourcefulness. Witness the number of battlefield commissions that have been awarded to fill the gaps. Under such emergency conditions, we cannot wait for OCS or the reserves in the States to supply leadership. The plain answer to this problem is that the Army must get its share of the best men, those who have the physical and mental qualifications to strengthen the ranks, and to provide on-the-spot leadership when officers and noncoms are cut down in combat.

The pressure of selective service, which is identified with the Army, induces highly qualified young men to enlist in other branches of the Armed Forces.

The Army is thus denied its fair choice of the best.

We had a similar experience in World War II, even after we had discounted the larger numerical needs of the Army.

To overcome this imbalance, all enlistments were frozen under Executive Order 9279, signed by President Roosevelt on December 5, 1942.

It provided for the most effective mobilization and utilization of the national manpower. It stipulated, among other matters, that, and I quote:

> The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall after consultation with the Chairman, determine the number of men required to be selected each month in order to fulfill the total respective requirements of the Army and Navy as approved by the President. The Chairman (of the War Manpower Commission) shall furnish the required number of men through the Selective Service System.

I believe that we should reinstate this policy now, in January of 1951.

As the supply of skilled industrial workers is completely absorbed by defense production, and the need for more becomes acute, it will become necessary to allocate manpower for industry, agriculture, and the Armed Forces under a set-up similar to the War Manpower Commission.

That organization, even with its defects, was good. Eliminating the contradictions and bottlenecks that were revealed by experience, we can build a better system of limited mobilization that can be expanded quickly, should the need arise.

The one factor that currently disturbs me is that our present program does not provide for over-all control through selective service in a way that will be fair to the rival claims of the Army, Navy, Marines, Air Force, and the Coast Guard.

As it is working now, it puts the Army under a definite disadvantage that will become worse as it strives to build up to authorized strength and quality.

We can understand why the Air Force and the Navy will insist that we stick to the free-choice method. Under it, they are getting first call on the brightest and healthiest youngsters.

But this is not serving the national security, under which the Army is still the largest and the most important arm of our defense. The opening phases of the great debate which will shape our foreign policy in the present crisis and determine how far we can go in our commitments, already point to this fact. In spite of our unchallenged sea power, and our qualitatively superior air power, the debate will resolve about the inadequacies of our land power, which means the Army.

To face this situation realistically, we have two alternatives.

Either we must freeze all enlistments and ration manpower for military purposes through the channels of selective service or assign enlistees and draftees wherever they are needed.

Both of these solutions are democratic. Whichever one we approve of will establish a common pool from which all services will draw without discrimination.

The present waste, confusion, and misassignment of individuals would be largely eliminated.

The Selective Service Act, as we know it, was designed to promote a continuing flow of enlistments into the Armed Forces. It did for the Air Force, Navy, and Marines but not for the Army. As a result, our military posture, as they call it, is that of a short-legged swimmer who can also fly. But can he move on the ground?

Even a mechanized Army has to walk, and for that we must have plenty of physically fit men with heads on their shoulders. Sure we need seamen and airmen, but we also need combat infantrymen, not in the Air Force or the Navy, but in the Army.

Do not leave the Army out in the cold when it comes to the allocation of brains and brawn.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman's statement is most important, but would not the gentleman feel that his recommendations of freezing enlistments would discourage voluntary enlistment? Does the gentleman recommend the selection of men in all services through the draft?

Mr. LANE. I assume what the gentleman suggests may be so to a certain extent. I offer this for what it is worth. I think the matter should have some study and I say that for the reason that during the Christmas holidays I had occasion to meet hundreds of young men who ventured from my city to the metropolitan area of greater Boston for the purpose of volunteering. They went to the city hall, they obtained their birth certificates, marriage records, or whatever was needed. They were interviewed by the Navy, by the Marines, by the Coast Guard, and by other persons in charge of voluntary enlistments. They produced whatever records were needed in reference to age, marriage, citizenship, and so forth.

They went through a complete physical examination, including the necessary X-ray examinations and passed the required aptitude tests. Those men in the recruiting service gave of their time to these boys in order to encourage them to come into the various services for which they were seeking men in this recruitment program.

Those boys after many trips back and forth into the recruitment office, having passed all of the necessary physical, mental, and aptitude tests and what not, having presented the proper papers that were necessary, were selected by the officers, only to find upon return to their homes a selective-service notice which barred them, after all of that procedure for voluntary enlistment. All of this waste of time, not only of these young men who wanted to volunteer for service, but also wasting the time and the taxpayers' money of the personnel in the Coast Guard, the Marines, and Navy who are assigned to this recruitment program. All of this work gone for naught, as I see it.

Mr. STEFAN. Of course, I found that to be true in my district; however, voluntary enlistments were encouraged by the recruiting officers from these various services, getting the young men who were going to be drafted anyhow to come to the recruiting office to make their selection, with the result that voluntary enlistments went up. There is no question about the fact that there is a lot of waste time and a lot of money expended in examining these volunteers at a time when the selective-service machinery is rolling along. But in the gentleman's formula, however, he would eliminate all voluntary enlistments and freeze the securing of manpower to the selective service.

Mr. LANE. I thank the gentleman from Nebraska for his observation, but may I add further that some procedure should be worked out between the selective service and the various military services that no voluntary enlistment be entertained until such time as the various draft boards are contacted to make certain that the applicant's draft call is not presently contemplated.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD] is recognized for 5 minutes.

A WAR COUNCIL OF GOVERNORS AND WORK FOR MR. HOOVER AND MR. BARUCH

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I believe with President Truman that this is the most dangerous year our Nation has ever faced and I believe, too, that the manner in which our Nation as a whole applies itself at this particular time will determine our survival as a free people.

Speaking last night in Passaic, N. J., in my home district, I discussed the bewilderment and confusion existing among our people in this hour of crisis.

I made two proposals before my people that I truly believe to be proper, wholesome, timely, and calculated to promote the unity for which the President appeals. In Passaic last night I said in part:

President Truman and former President Hoover want America to be saved and they may not be so far apart as some believe. I think it would not only be the magnanimous thing to do, I think it would be most patriotic and helpful if Mr. Truman were to give Mr. Hoover a place in the councils of the Nation during this crisis. I think, too, we need to draft men like Bernard Baruch, who has been proven to be so right in the past. The appointment of General Electric's Charles E. Wilson to head the mobilization-production effort was a lift to a people bewildered by the lack of action.

Then, I went on to say, discussing another problem:

Consider the situation of the governors of our 48 States, so many of whom today have different views on civilian defense.

One governor has ordered the rapid construction of atom bomb shelters; another expresses doubt as to the defense merits of such construction.

Several governors insist that their States cannot possibly match the Federal Government in providing the necessary funds for bomb shelters.

I believe it timely to propose the formation of a war council of governors to meet in Washington at the earliest possible time on this and other problems affecting the war of survival. If such a council feels there should be amendments to the new and untried national civilian defense legislation then Congress can go to work at once on such amendments.

My Washington mail reflects the feelings of thousands of Passaic County fathers and mothers anxious to know if the United Nations is going to do more in this world's struggle. They are disturbed over reports that friendly European nations lack the will to fight and are leaning on us for men, money, and material which may be lost when the real shooting begins. Personally, I feel General Eisenhower is determined to get the right answer for himself and the American people, and I am certain that he will soon report the facts to us. It is extremely important that his present mission be speeded.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts who has been so active in behalf of a real civil-defense program on all levels.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is not the gentleman very glad that Gen. Lucius Clay is associated with Mr. Wilson in his production effort?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes. I think, too, that the people of the United States got a real lift when his appointment was indicated.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. He had a brilliant career in the Army as well as in his peace work as an engineer on flood control and navigation. During the war he had a brilliant career in Germany.

Mr. CANFIELD. And upon his return he started the State of New York off on a real civilian-defense program; the State of New York being now ahead of any other State of the Union in that respect.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Very modest and very unselfish.

Mr. CANFIELD. That is true.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed in the President's address for more reasons than one, but most particularly because he failed to state anything concerning our policy of preventing Communist infiltration of Russian espionage agents and saboteurs here at home. Following World War II, during and after the Eightieth Congress, President Truman called the investigations being performed by the Committee on Un-American Activities and other committees of Congress "red herrings" no less than a dozen times. I was glad to see that the President did not refer to any of these investigations in his message as being "red herrings," but I wish that he had made some definite policy and stated something definite to the American people and to we Members of Congress regarding his proposal in protecting us from the infiltration of saboteurs and espionage agents during this very crucial time in American history.

MORAL REARMAMENT

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested yesterday afternoon in listening in to the Moral Rearmament Conference at the Shoreham Hotel. It was chiefly a military services meeting. I was very much interested in hearing British military officers speak of the great need to guard against and fight against communism in England and in the governments of the world, against communism in high places in government, in executive offices and all through the different departments, against communism in our offices in this country, against communism among all the peoples of all countries. There are representatives from many countries of the world at the conference now being held. I was deeply interested also in the work they are doing in industrial relations, in bringing about the settlement of strikes between management and labor. Certainly their aim is very fine, and they seem like a great, high-minded group. Today the Moral Rearmament Conference feels the fight against communism of major importance.

THE ASSUMPTIONIST FATHERS

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, of recent date, a truly epochal event transpired, which attracted wide interest in my native State of Massachusetts and throughout the Nation. I refer to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the religious order of the Augustinians of the Assumption, noted and revered in many places throughout the world and known particularly with fame, respect, and gratitude throughout my own district as the Assumptionist Fathers of Worcester.

It was entirely fitting that special exercises should have marked this significant event. The centennial observance was noted in the National Capital on Sunday, December 31, where a solemn pontifical high mass of thanksgiving was celebrated at the St. Vincent de Paul Chapel of Catholic University. Presiding over this impressive ceremony was his distinguished excellency, the Most Reverend Amleto Giovanni Cicognani, D. D., titular archbishop of Laodicea and apostolic delegate to the United States, who by express direction of the Holy Pontiff brought papal greetings, compliments, and felicitations to the members of the Assumptionist order and its friends assembled in the Capital.

Father Ignatius Smith, O. P., noted member of the Catholic University staff, delivered a powerful commemorative address and paid appropriate and moving tribute to this outstanding religious group, which has made such noteworthy spiritual contributions during the past century.

I can speak with a sense of intimate personal knowledge of the great work of the Assumptionist Fathers. It has been my happy privilege to enjoy warm friendship with many of the leaders and members of this famous religious group and those they have trained and instructed. The magnificent work, the unselfish devotion, the spiritual motivation second to none, the monumental contributions in education, in teaching, in charity, in propagation of the faith, in many worthwhile spiritual activities, indelibly stamp this splendid order as an organization distinguished by rare achievement and notable leadership. I am, therefore, personally very happy and proud to be able today in the Congress of the United States to add my voice to those which have been raised, during the centennial, in commendation of this great order and to express my heartiest congratulations and to extend my genuine best wishes for the future upon this occasion.

If my colleagues would bear with me briefly, I should like to present the chronology a short, and I hope interesting, historical outline of the Assumptionist order. It is significant to observe that it was just 100 years ago on Christmas Day in the year 1850 that the Assumptionist order was founded in the holy chapel of the College of the Assumption at Nimes, France, by a zealous, able, and pious young priest, Father Emmanuel d'Alzon. From this small, humble beginning of a few heroic, but zealous, souls in a small community in beautiful and historic France, banding together in a common cause, has developed the present great and widespread order, which at the present time numbers almost 2,000 members and is established in 22 different countries throughout the world, engaging in its magnificant activities in some 19 colleges, 11 seminaries, 20 apostolic schools, 8 novitiates, 5 orphanages, and over 500 parishes.

Not confined to orthodox educational, charitable and spiritual work alone, the Assumptionists also conduct the well known and celebrated Maison de la Bonne Presse at Paris, which is in effect in our accepted American usage, a substantial publishing house, issuing some 20 weekly and monthly magazines widely distributed and read in many countries. This publishing house established and conducted by the order, also prepares and issues La Croix, which is, in fact, the largest Catholic daily publication in the world.

The growth of the order in this country has been truly phenomenal. First arriving in this country about the year 1900, it founded Assumption College in Worcester, Mass., which has since become one of our best known and outstanding institutions of secondary and higher learning in New England. I believe there are few, if any, counterparts of this school in the Nation. It is indeed unique in that about one-half of its curriculum is offered and conducted in the French language and the remainder in English. It was quite natural, therefore, that Assumption College should attract from the very start an increasing number of young men of Franco-American heritage, particularly from New England, who have received the benefit of sterling training and education and thereafter have taken their places in positions of trust, responsibility, and fruitful contribution in the professional, religious, business, and civil life in the communities of our section. And in turn these citizens of proud Franco-American birth are among our best and most loyal Americans.

I am also proud indeed to allude to the illustrious and brilliant leaders, who have graced the labors of the Assumptionist order in the United States. Every successful human endeavor springs from gifted, imaginative, energetic leadership. This order has been particularly and abundantly blessed with leaders of the very first magnitude. First and foremost, these men have been distinguished by their profound faith and a moving quality of piety and humility. Because of the breadth and depth of their training and instruction, as well as native endowments, these men have been policy makers and administrators in the best sense of these words. Possessed of great natural gifts, powerful intellects, dynamic energy, and unselfish zeal for the great cause they espouse, the leaders of the Assumption order have made a most distinctive and enviable record. From my own district comes that fine priest and learned gentleman, the Very Reverend Wilfrid J. Dufault, A. A., North American provincial of the order, who has administrative charge of all its activities in Mexico, Canada, and the United States. Born in Spencer, Mass., and himself a graduate of Assumption College, he is one of the youngest provincials of the order, and at the age of 43, he most ably and most admirably discharges the heavy responsibilities and duties of this important office. He succeeded another outstanding figure, the Very Reverend Crescent Armanet, A. A., now one of the provincial councilors and Superior of the Assumption community at the church of Our Lady of Esperanza in New York City, cultured and able spiritual leader, who for many years did magnificent work as president of Assumption College. The present head of the college is the Reverend Henri J. Moquin, A. A., another warm friend of mine, a real leader of personality, zeal, and marked attainments, who comes from Marlboro, Mass., also in my congressional district.

Many Members of the House will recall another able and world-famous young priest of this order, the Reverend Leopold Braun, A. A., of New Bedford, Mass., who, you will remember was stationed for 12 long arduous years at Moscow where he was the only American priest in the unhappy land which can claim within its broad domain only one single evangelical church of any Christian faith. Still another distinguished young priest in my district has since replaced him, the Reverend John O. A. Brassard of Leominster, also an able and effective representative of the order and of our American principles of freedom and justice.

I think it is most appropriate that we should pause here to note the unselfish endeavors of these fine men and the order whose heritage they have so brilliantly illumined.

America can be thankful to the Almighty for many things. For the matchless beauty of our land, the wealth of our resources, the genius, loyalty, and prosperity of our people and the religious and patriotic faith which has been the ceaseless source of our spiritual strength. It is men like the Assumptionist Fathers and their associates who have nourished the wellsprings of this faith.

The Nation is rich indeed which can attract to its border groups like the Assumptionist Fathers whose piety, patriotism, and unselfish labor in the vineyards of the Almighty must ever be a deep inspiration to citizens of every race and creed who cherish the real meaning of American liberty.

May this order grow and prosper in the future. May it spread its benign good influence. When another 100 years have been recorded in the master book of Father Time, may it be again written in imperishable gold letters, as it has been during the past century, that this order has continued undying devotion to its ideals and steadfast loyalty to its purpose and has added still more glorious chapters to its brilliant achievements.

May the Assumptionist Fathers continue to find in their noble service to the Almighty and humanity that supreme satisfaction and happiness which come from the knowledge of having done something for others, from having stood ever loyal to the cause of God and country.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the way, the truth, and the life, wilt Thou now hear us as, in simplicity and sincerity, we offer unto Thee our penitential prayers.

We humbly and penitently confess that, as members of the family of God, we have not been heeding Thy voice when Thou didst say, "This is the way, walk ye therein."

Our own conscience tells us that we have often allowed materialism, as a habit of life, to take such a strong hold upon us.

The windows of our souls have become opaque and our vision of the higher values has become eclipsed by our ambition to gain for ourselves a vast accumulation of the world's goods and of material strength and power.

We have been misdirecting so much of our energy by striving feverishly for that which is not bread and laboring for that which can never satisfy.

We have neglected to keep in mind the great spiritual goals and objectives and have failed to see that the soul of all culture is the culture of the soul.

Grant us Thy pardoning grace and during this year may we venture forth eagerly and courageously upon the nobler ways of life. May we unite our wills and purposes with Thine in bringing in the day of peace.

Hear us in the name of our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

CONGRESSIONAL REDISTRICTING—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 36)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with the provisions of section 22 of the act of June 18, 1929, as amended (2 U. S. C. 2a), relating to the decennial censuses and the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, I transmit herewith a statement prepared by the Director of the Census, Department of Commerce, giving the whole number of persons in each State as ascertained under the seventeenth decennial census of population, and the number of Representatives to which each State is entitled under an apportionment of the existing number of Representatives. All Indians are included in the tabulation of total population, since all Indians are now subject to Federal taxation.

Under the law, each State will be entitled commencing in the Eighty-third Congress, to the number of Representatives shown in the statement. In a House of 435 Members, the number fixed by law, the population changes reflected by the census will require a change in the number of Representatives for 16 States. Seven States will gain, and nine States will lose seats.

In accordance with the statute, it will be the duty of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, within 15 calendar days after the receipt of the statement I am now transmitting, to certify to the executive of each State the number of Representatives to which such State is entitled. The statute then prescribes the ways in which any changes in the number of Representatives shall be handled until the States shall have redistricted in accordance with the changes in population.

These procedures of existing law are of great value to the operation of our Government. They provide an established method of carrying out, almost automatically, the constitutional plan for apportioning Representatives among the States on the basis of population.

However, certain problems have arisen with respect to the creation of appropriate districts within the States, which merit the consideration of the Congress.

Over the years, widespread discrepancies have grown up between the populations of the various congressional districts. While some variation is inevitable, the extreme differences that now exist can and should be corrected. For example, there is one State in which, according to the 1950 census, the smallest district has a population of under 175,000 and the largest district has a population exceeding 900,000. In many States, there are differences of 200,000 or 300,000 people between the smallest and largest existing districts in the State. While about half of the congressional districts throughout the country are between 300,000 and 400,000 in population, there are some 50 districts with a population of 250,000 or less, and, at the other extreme, some 50 districts with a population of 450,000 or over. Furthermore, as population has increased, several States have added Congressmen at Large instead of redistricting, as they should.

Such defects in our system of congressional districts obstruct the effective operation of the democratic principles on which our whole Government rests. It is fundamental to the whole structure of the Constitution that all citizens have equal representation, so far as practicable, in the House of Representatives. This basic principle is not carried out unless congressional districts are drawn up to reflect population changes.

The present statute clearly contemplates that the States will redistrict after an apportionment. Redistricting is the task of the State legislatures and must, of course, continue to be so. However, it is also a matter of national concern, and the Congress has a constitutional obligation in this field which cannot be overlooked. Article I, section 4, of the Constitution provides that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but Congress may by law make or alter such regulations.

For many years the Congress exercised this power. From 1842 through 1911 the apportionment statutes enacted by the Congress as the result of each succeeding census required each State having more than one Representative to divide itself into single-Member districts, thus holding down the number of Congressmen at Large. This requirement is not included in the legislation which now governs the subject. Furthermore, prior to 1929, many of the apportionment statutes enacted by the Congress called upon the States to follow certain standards in establishing congressional districts. They usually provided, as for example in the 1911 act—Thirty-seventh United States Statutes, page 13—that in each State entitled under the apportionment to more than one Representative, the Representatives should be elected by districts composed of contiguous and compact territory, and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants. These standards provided a guide for the States which was, in most cases, followed.

It seems to me desirable that the Congress at this time should give its attention to this important problem and enact legislation, supplemental to the permanent legislation on this subject, which would provide the States with standards for establishing congressional districts and indicate the congressional interest in compliance with such standards.

Such legislation might reaffirm the basic policy of our Government to have single-member districts. It might also repeat the old and accepted standard that congressional districts be composed of contiguous and compact territory and contain as nearly as practicable the same number of individuals. To give more definitiveness to such standards, it might be advisable for the Congress to consider establishing limits for the permitted deviations in population between districts. It would be possible, for example, for the statute to specify that no district in any State should deviate upward or downward from the average population of all congressional districts within that State by more than a specified percentage. In terms of the present census, assuming an average district of about 350,000 persons, a percentage permitting a range of about 50,000 above and below that figure would probably allow for the practical difficulties which State legislatures face in drawing up district boundaries.

The Congress should not be satisfied merely with enacting such standards. It should assume responsibility for seeing that the standards are in fact complied with. This might be done by providing for adequate reports from the States on the action they have taken in redistricting and by providing for continued congressional attention to the results. I believe that the enactment of the standards by itself will have a tremendous influence and that most States will seek earnestly to comply. If there are occasions in which flagrant refusal to comply is made manifest, the Congress has the power under the Constitution to take the matter in its own hands.

In any case, it is important that the proper redistricting be done promptly. Redistricting should be completed not later than the spring of 1952 so that the congressional elections of that year may give fair representation to all citizens of our country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, in reference to this message from the President, I wish to call attention to something that occurred in my district which may be rather significant. In one small town I found upon investigation that 137 persons had not been counted. I asked for a recount. It is rather late to get the result into the official report, but the recount showed that they had overlooked 137 people even in the small village—a Republican village, of course.

THE SPIRIT OF OUR SOLDIERS

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include an excerpt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, during a very brief visit to my home in Galveston, Tex., at Christmas time, a friend of mine stopped me on the street to show me a letter he had received from his son in the Army. The son was one of those veterans recalled to active duty last summer.

The attitude which is reflected in his letter struck me as exceptionally fine and worthy of publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an inspiration not only to other young men who may face military service, but also to the people at home who frequently need a boost in morale even more than the men in service.

The part of the letter which is of such timely interest and which is inserted in the RECORD with the permission of the writer, Tom Affleck, Jr., follows:

I think that we all must go in order to see this thing through to a victorious conclusion.

I for one am ready to defend my country at any time and in any capacity that I am needed.

When I joined the Reserve component of the Army, I did so deliberately—knowing full well that when my country was in need I would be among the first to be called.

This is not the time for indecision or the putting of one's personal hopes, wishes, and aspirations above the needs of the Nation.

PHYSICAL FITNESS PROGRAM

Mr. HEDRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEDRICK. Mr. Speaker, during the closing days of the last session I introduced a concurrent resolution directing the President to establish a physical fitness program in this country. As a physician I am greatly disturbed about the physical defects that are being found among our draftees. In July 58-plus percent of the draftees were turned down due mainly to psychopathic, physical, and mental defects. That has gradually dropped until in October less than 35 percent were being turned down, but in November there was an increase of fourtenths of 1 percent above October. That may mean that we are hitting the bottom of the barrel; or it may mean leveling off of our qualified men for military duty. The Nation is just as strong as its citizens are physically fit. It is important that this country do something to improve the fitness of our citizens as rapidly as possible. On yesterday I reintroduced House Concurrent Resolution 19, hoping that the President will take some action immediately in this regard.

THE CRISIS FACING THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, a supreme crisis this week faces the United Nations. If it fails to meet that crisis in a bold and forthright manner, it is difficult to see how it can survive as an effective force for world peace. As one who has enthusiastically supported the organization as the world's best hope, I am greatly troubled by its apparent ineffectiveness in the face of naked aggression. We, who are the elected spokesmen for the people, can perform a service this week by speaking out plainly.

When a small country, North Korea, crossed the thirty-eighth parallel last June, the United Nations was quick to condemn this action as aggression. It placed its armies, 90 percent of them Americans, at the side of the invaded Republic of Korea to repel the invasion.

Now a large country, Communist China, is the aggressor. This last week end the world has witnessed the sorry spectacle of the United States delegation to the United Nations running around among the other delegates begging them to fall in line behind a resolution to brand the Chinese Communists, like the North Korean Reds, as aggressors and threats to the peace of the world. If aggression by 100,000 North Korean Communists was wrong in June, certainly aggression by a million Chinese Communists is at least equally wrong now.

There is great danger that public opinion in this country, heretofore generally favorable toward a world peace organization like the United Nations, will withdraw its support, unless there is a prompt change in the present weak-kneed attitude of the delegates representing the other countries, which have, at least, as much at stake as the United States in preventing the Communists from overrunning all of Asia and Europe.

Whether their motive in pursuing the appeasement mirage be a desire not to interfere with profitable commercial ventures in the Orient or a feeling that the Kremlin, mastermind behind the Chinese Communists' move, will seek to punish those nations with courage to face up to the facts or a fear that a forthright attitude will cause Russia to strike in Western Europe in retaliation or whatever their motive be, it makes no difference. In the long run, they are the losers, not the gainers, by their intransigent position and must be made to see it. Unless they display the same fortitude on the political and moral front which has been demanded and demonstrated, mostly by American boys, on the battlefield, the public reaction in this country will be such as to lead almost inevitably to the collapse of the United Nations as an effective force in stabilizing world conditions.

The patience of the American people has already been stretched to the breaking point through the failure of other governments whose professed aims and ideals parallel ours, with a couple of notable exceptions, to supply anything like their share of the fighting forces to repel aggression in the Far East. If the same attitude characterizes response to the request of our representatives for a forceful stand on the diplomatic front, it may well break that tenuous thread which binds the loyal backing of the people of this country to the United Nations.

The argument is sincerely advanced that a condemnatory resolution would be ineffective and might even have the effect of emphasizing the difference in treatment accorded a large and a small power, unless the members of the United Nations are prepared to follow up such a resolution with tangible force to repel aggression. To that view I cannot subscribe. Overwhelming force of numbers may dictate different treatment, but the evil is the same. Morality demands that an international crime be recognized and denounced.

It would be a tragedy to see the collapse of this organization which has held the sincere hopes of so many millions for future world peace and security. Its testing time is here. The fate of the United Nations rests with those who are prepared to demonstrate that they will match pious utterances with forthright action.

THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, ever since the Communist aggression in Korea, there has been a growing dislocation of our economy resulting from both artificial and real scarcities of basic raw materials. The Department of Defense has been hampered in the procurement of essential military equipment. The housewife has been forced to pay unconscionable prices for daily family needs. Legitimate businessmen, particularly those operating small plants, have been jeopardized in the operation of their concerns. With the increased demands of our rearmament program this condition will inevitably become more critical.

A substantial portion of this disruption has occurred because of unscrupulous black marketing. Numerous complaints by responsible parties have come to my attention. For example, in one case a regular check for the materials purchased must be sent to the supplier and then cash paid "on the side" for the black-market mark-up. Steel is apparently available but only at outrageous prices. Fly-by-night suppliers have steel while those who have been in business for long periods cannot obtain even a fair share. The situation in steel is atrocious and must be remedied.

Under the Defense Production Act of 1950 which Congress approved in September of last year, the executive branch of the Federal Government does have authority to cope with this very serious problem. However, the Congress itself does have a continuing obligation to investigate conditions of this sort. I believe that this job can best be accomplished by the Congress by setting up a select committee to scrutinize and police certain activities related to the defense effort. Therefore, I am today introducing a resolution which would create a select committee to conduct a full and complete investigation and study of, and methods of preventing, the black-marketing of materials essential to the defense program.

Those responsible for and participating in the black market while our youth are fighting for our country should be exposed and punished. The committee after a comprehensive investigation of such reprehensible conduct should recommend to the Senate and House new legislation, if necessary, for a full crackdown on such gougers who are hindering the rearmament effort.

RESTORATION OF PROPER MAIL SERVICE TO THE PEOPLE

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department is our first line of defense. With millions of young men going away to join the colors and to don the uniform of our country I believe the greatest builder of morale, not only of our Armed Forces but of our home population, is to see that the Post Office Department gives a proper and prompt mail service to the country.

Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill entitled "To Direct the Postmaster General To Restore Proper Mail Service to the People" which does not involve the expenditure of one additional penny. This proposed bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is hereby directed to—

1. Restore delivery of mail to two trips daily.
2. Increase hours of collection to normal.
3. Restore former hours of distribution for all classes of mail.
4. Insure previous high percentage of accurate delivery of mail through restoring the direction section.
5. Increase hours of service at windows and over the platform.

I believe that the greatest builder of morale of our Armed Forces is the restoration of service by the Post Office Department to where it should be.

Such a bill will give our postal service back to the people. I remember during World War II the splendid work done by the personnel of the Post Office Department.

They saw to it that the mail went through.

They gave cheerful and efficient service to the folks back home by rushing letters from their GI sons and relatives.

They built up a secure feeling among our troops by promptness in handling their messages of devotion to loved ones.

Today the Department needs a shot in the arm and a return to the old routine.

Let us take a hand to assure our people in their time of need a mail service unhampered by regulations which shrink efficient operation but one which personifies the age-old slogan, "The Mails Must Go Through."

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I listened with attention and courtesy to the speech on the state of the Union delivered before the joint session of the House and Senate by the President. I must say, however, that I was astonished at some of the statements he made; one in particular I shall quote at this time:

> Our programs of economic aid have done much to turn back communism.

Mr. Speaker, where has communism been turned back? In 1945 the Soviet Union and her satellites controlled a little over 300,000,000 people. Today they control over 800,000,000 people.

If that is turning back communism, I would like to see some other method tried.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BYRNE of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a report of the Committee on the Reapportionment of Congress of the American Political Science Association.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, and in each include newspaper articles.

Mr. PERKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial from the Courier-Journal of January 7, entitled "Abandon Europe to Conquest Is Taft's Policy Once More."

Mr. YORTY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article and an editorial.

Mr. WILSON of Texas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. DINGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, in one on the subject of the St. Lawrence waterway, and in the other on the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the city of Detroit.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. ARENDS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter.

Mr. BUSH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article concerning former Member of the House Robert F. Rich, published in a Williamsport paper of December 31, 1950.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article taken from the Washington Observer entitled "Senator MARTIN Sensed Red Peril Early."

Mr. TOLLEFSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, and in each include extraneous matter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter from a constituent regarding the Korean situation.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include historical quotations.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. CANFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include editorial matter.

Mr. FISHER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. BEALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, and in one to include a telegram from the mayor of Hagerstown and in another an editorial from the Washington Post.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Friday next, and that when the House adjourns on Friday it adjourn to meet the following Monday. I might also announce that on Friday there will be no business, so that the Members can govern themselves accordingly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. REES of Kansas asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Friday next following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. POTTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes on Friday next following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. JAVITS asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes on Friday next following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. STEED asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Monday next at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

WILL THE AMERICAN PEOPLE BE HEARD?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, upon the administration and the Congress rests the duty of deciding within the next few days or weeks whether this Nation shall again for the third time within a period of 40 years become irrevocably committed to an all-out, world-wide war.

In England the minority party, disagreeing with the policies of the majority, may in Parliament call for a vote of lack of confidence. If that move wins, the issue then goes direct to the people and the people, with the issues before them, elect to the Parliament individuals pledged to carry out the then will of the people.

Here, the people cannot officially make known their decision as to the wisdom or lack of wisdom of the administration's present policy until 1952, when it may be too late.

Here, the people have but one remedy left to them if they wish to change the present trend of events. That remedy is the turning loose upon their Representatives in Congress of an overwhelming flood of protesting communications.

There is one sure way of making a Senator or a Congressman respond to the people's will; that is, to convince him by personal messages that the home folks demand, will insist upon, a certain course of action.

While our Government is said to be under the two-party system, neither party has a firm, clear-cut policy.

The membership of the Democratic Party is not in complete accord as to our foreign policy. They are in hopeless disagreement on some phases of our domestic policy.

The same may be said of the Republican Party and its members.

Whether a Member of Congress is a Democrat or a Republican is determined not by the principles to which he adheres, the program for which he votes, but by the party label under which he was elected. That, at least, has been the situation up until the present time. Sometimes the label is a misleading one. Yesterday Senator MORSE, of Oregon, reelected in November upon the Republican ticket, told Republican leaders that he did not wish to be a member of the Republican committee, which in 1952 will be charged with the election of Republicans to the Senate.

The press reports that one faction of the Democratic Party in the other body, displeased over its inability to elect the party leader and the party whip, was holding a conference to determine upon ways and means of putting over its own legislative program.

In the House, while the Democrats are fairly well united upon a foreign policy, there are two factions, one determined as in the last Congress to put across the President's so-called social program; the other, equally determined that such a policy shall not go through.

A majority of the Democrats would probably go along with the President in some sort of a program which would tax our resources and our manpower in aid to our professed but unreliable allies.

On the Republican side there is a somewhat similar division of opinion.

A majority of the Republicans in the House would probably oppose such a policy, believing as they do, that complete involvement in world war III would undermine the welfare of our people, destroy our individual liberty, make us subject to a military dictatorship, make the future of the Republic insecure.

In my humble opinion, there should be a realinement of our political forces—this, not only because we must have a degree of unity if any foreign policy is to succeed, but because no foreign policy can succeed unless we have a sound domestic policy of which the people approve.

Ever since 1933 our domestic policy has been based upon the premise that the Federal Government owed an obligation to the citizen to protect him from want or hardship, even though the fault be his own. The result is that today, to a large extent, the citizen has lost the will to act independently, to work and to sacrifice to make his future secure.

The people, as always in the world's history, choosing the broad and apparently easy way, thinking more of the present than of the future, in part, because of the failure of those of contrary opinion to aggressively point out the danger, have endorsed that policy.

Ever since 1916, when President Wilson was elected upon a platform of "He kept us out of war," our foreign policy has been one of confusion.

The administration, elected upon that platform, at once became involved in World War I.

From that day on, internationalists have been an ever-increasing force in formulating our foreign policy. Through propaganda, they apparently convinced our people—at least they convinced those in authority—that the United States of America had so few friends abroad, that its people were so lacking in faith in their Government, in courage, and endurance, that our existence depended, at one time upon the British fleet, and since then upon the purchasable good will and aid of other nations; that, to protect the Western Hemisphere, our men must fight abroad wherever war reared its ugly head.

The internationalists believe that safety for the Republic lies only in the surrendering of a degree of its independence, our membership in some sort of a world-wide organization.

They are willing to surrender a part of our sovereignty, join a world-wide organization, where we, though the most powerful and wealthy member, will be at the beck and call, our fighting men subject to the orders of, a majority of that organization.

Opposing that sort of foreign policy are those who believe that, while we should be charitable and helpful to all people seeking and willing to fight for their own freedom, we should retain our right of independent action; become involved in only those wars which actually, not theoretically, endanger the welfare of our people, the security of our Republic.

Today the cleavage between these two schools of thought is clear and definite. In my humble judgment, believing as I do in a two-party system of government, to me it seems apparent that there either should be a shifting of party names, as for example, a conservative and a liberal party or a realinement within each party.

The latter procedure might result in four parties, that is, a conservative and a liberal group in each of the two present political parties. That procedure, however, would make it still more difficult for the people to effectively express their will.

An accurate and a correct definition of either a liberal or a conservative is difficult for all to agree upon. Each, in the minds of different individuals and groups, has different meanings.

A liberal has been described to be one who desires to spend other people's money—a radical and a wild-eyed, long-haired irresponsible, with foolish notions.

A conservative has been described to be a penny-pinching, reactionary old fossil, who prefers candlelight to electricity, a horse and buggy to modern methods of travel; one who might eat his food raw.

Of course, such a characterization of either is absurd. But both are used by the smear artists, some of whom concede neither good sense nor patriotism to their opponents.

An internationalist or a one-worlder has been described as a starry-eyed joiner who believes that universal permanent peace can be obtained through some world-wide organization wherein everyone has divested himself of all human frailties.

He has also been described as a warmonger, a profiteer willing to turn the flesh and blood of his countrymen into dollars.

An isolationist has been charged with being a coward, one who would dig a hole, crawl into it, block the entrance, let the rest of the world go hang.

Again, neither definition is accurate.

Beyond question, there are liberals and conservatives, internationalists and isolationists, more preferably nationalists, who seek only the welfare of mankind, peaceful security for all peoples and nations. The objectives of all are, or at least should be, the same—the welfare of mankind, peace on earth.

As always in the world's history, there are at least two methods of approach to these two supremely desirable ends.

We will, at the moment, forget the domestic problems, the so-called liberals, the so-called conservatives; concern ourselves only with the solution of the international problem.

That problem today has its two schools of thought. On the one hand, we have those who believe that the welfare of our people and the security of our Republic is dependent upon our involvement, our participation with all our arms, our men and our resources, in world war III. That program is backed by President Truman, Dean Acheson, Tom Dewey, John Foster Dulles, to name but a few.

Opposed to that program are those who believe that while we can with caution extend aid to other nations which profess to be opposed to communism, to dictatorship—those nations and those peoples who are willing to make a fight for their freedom and independence, if they desire freedom and independence, we cannot with safety to ourselves, send our land forces to fight everywhere, whenever, wherever in the world Stalin, his stooges, or any other would-be ambitious dictator starts a war.

The views of this latter group have been expressed by former President Herbert Hoover, by Senator Taft, by Joseph P. Kennedy, all of whom but gave voice to the thought and convictions of millions of Americans of like opinion and upon whom would fall the burden of world war III.

Senator MORSE may have unintentionally rendered a worth-while service to his country in disassociating himself from the Senate Republican group which will be charged with electing Senators in 1952.

Just the other day, in a Republican conference of the House Members, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS], when I disagreed with him, called attention to the fact that, in a district where registered Democrats far outnumbered registered Republicans, he was elected on the Republican ticket.

In the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan, it was my privilege to be elected, after having expressed views similar to those of former President Hoover and Senator TAFT. Undoubtedly, the gentleman from New York, gifted though he is, could not even be nominated on the Republican ticket in the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan, if he expressed his sincere convictions prior to election.

Equally true, I could not be even nominated, certainly not elected, in the district which he represents, if I there spoke my convictions.

Many other similar illustrations showing how both Senators and Congressmen have been elected under a party label, though their convictions differed from those of the majority of the party whose label they carried on election day, might be cited.

Is it not time that those in the Republican Party who do not hold the convictions held by a majority of those elected as Republicans withdraw from that party organization, as apparently has Senator MORSE, and aid in forming new parties?

If party solidarity is their goal, our Democratic friends are in no better situation than are Republicans.

The southerners are determinedly opposed to much of the President's so-called social program. They, like a majority of the Republicans, have profound convictions as to the soundness of the principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence.

In the Senate, they have a stanch group led by such men as BYRD, RUSSELL, and MCCLELLAN, to mention but a few, who believe, as do TAFT, WHERRY, and MILLIKIN, in a balanced budget, in a Federal Government which lives within its income.

There has been much talk and newspaper comment about some sort of a coalition between southern Democrats and northern Republicans. Actually, there is no such coalition. The hard, cold fact is that individual members of both parties, both liberals and conservatives, when an issue arises, vote on that issue, not according to their party labels but according to the principles and the program in which they believe.

This situation makes clear that the party label is no guaranty of party loyalty or of the principles or convictions entertained by the individual party member.

Whether Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson, and those of their political school, or Senator BYRD, Congressman COX, Congressman HOWARD SMITH, and those who follow their political philosophy, represent the Democratic Party is a question which must be left to the determination of that party's political organization.

But, do I hear you ask, who does represent, for example, the Republican Party? Is it Mr. Dewey? Is it Mr. TAFT?

On that subject, at least this may be said—that, ever since 1932, the Republican Party has been led by those who might truthfully be termed "internationalists," perhaps designated as liberals; in some instances, characterized as imitators of the New Deal-Fair Deal philosophy. Three times have Deweyites, twice led by Mr. Dewey himself, gone to the people in November, and three times in the last 18 years under their leadership Republicans have failed to win a national election or any one of the eight congressional elections other than in 1946, when they obtained control of the Congress.

Now, to the internationalists—to Mr. Dewey and his followers—I plead, isn't it fair that, having struck out three times, in succession, failed to win in seven out of eight tries you go back, sit down on the bench and let the so-called isolationists—in reality, the nationalists, and conservatives—in the Republican Party go just once to the people of the Nation on a clear-cut, simple issue?

Is it improper to suggest to Mr. Dewey that he, his protege, John Foster Dulles, and others of like mind follow the courageous example of Senator MORSE, openly disassociate themselves from the Republican Party, and, under their own label and symbol, join the liberals, the one-worlders, the internationalists; then, as such, under their true party label, seek the people's support?

If Mr. Dewey, Mr. Dulles, and those who follow their policies and program are willing to announce themselves as internationalists, adopt a program setting forth their well-known views on this one issue, it is my humble judgment that those of us who have been challenged as isolationists are quite willing to go to the country as nationalists upon a platform opposing appeasement of the incessant demands of our so-called allies, of our known enemies; expressing faith in the principles of our Constitution, confidence in the productive ability, the courageous determination of our people to remain independent and, with their associates in the Western Hemisphere, fight their own battles, protect themselves against any aggression.

If a situation of that kind can be created, then the people will have a chance to effectively, conclusively, make their wishes known as to the policies, both domestic and foreign, which the Congress should follow.

If this country is to have political integrity, a new party alinement, based upon principles, is necessary. Such an alinement is necessary, not for political reasons or partisan purposes, or as a springboard to office, but because the people have the right to be represented in the White House and in the Congress by individuals who will follow express and make effective the people's desires, their convictions, as to our future foreign policy.

Failing such an alinement, the only remedy the American people have available in this, the great, crisis which confronts them, is the right of petition to their Congress—petitions signed by so many written in such unmistakable language that the Congress will be induced to follow the course which the people believe, and by their vote indicate, will promote the people's welfare—make our Republic secure against foreign aggression.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MASON. I recall to the gentleman's mind that 10 years ago I suggested just such a division. I suggested that BRICKER and BYRD run against Roosevelt and Wallace, making a clear-cut division and a clear-cut issue.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; I remember. But, as we know, they did not take your advice. Had they done so we would have since that election have had a Government somewhat approaching one of, by, and for the people instead of one established by the paid propagandists.

And the Republican Party three times, permit a repetition, the Republican Party, that great Republican Party, three times let Mr. Dewey, the internationalists, and the so-called liberals go to bat. Three times they struck out. And in twenty-odd years we have not won a single election, except the one in 1946 when we took over the Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

THE UNITED NATIONS—LAST ROUND-UP?

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, the UN, despite its weaknesses, has been at least a symbol for the expression of the collective moral judgments of mankind on international questions. If it fails to say soon and overwhelmingly that Communist China is an aggressor in Korea, it will have failed of its purpose, reduced to its lowest common denominator. What the free world can do about aggression, how to do it, involves questions upon which there can be honest differences of opinion. What civilization can do about crime is always a question, but whenever civilization fails to recognize and denounce crime for fear of the consequences of its own moral judgment, civilization is gone. I do not think that civilization has failed in this crisis. If, however, the United Nations fails to record the moral judgment of civilization by recognizing and denouncing this aggression in Korea, it is headed for its last round-up. I hope that, in this grave crisis, the representatives of the free nations of the world act wisely, rightly, bravely—and soon.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY FOR MORAL REARMAMENT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, following the President's message to us yesterday on the state of the Union, all of us are even more keenly aware of the monumental task before us and the vital importance to the survival of civilization of the steps the United States of America takes in this critical hour in world history.

All of us have noted in the many excellent reports appearing in the public press of an unusual conference which has been taking place here in Washington. Many Members of this House and of the Senate as well have attended its sessions.

I refer to the National Assembly for Moral Rearmament, which took place December 30 to January 8 at the Shoreham Hotel. The theme of the assembly was "An ideology that can win the world."

It has been encouraging indeed, at a time when we are compelled to appropriate billions of dollars and mobilize millions of men to meet the threat of world communism, that evidence should be presented in our midst of a burgeoning world force which is answering communism in men's minds and hearts, and through the capture of key leadership in critical areas has actually turned the tide of communism in some of the most vital danger spots in Europe and Asia.

Mr. Speaker, a most representative cross-section of American citizens attended this conference from every section of the country. They are, of course, too numerous to mention here. I would like only to point out as one example of the effectiveness of moral rearmament in producing national unity in this time of crisis, that the presidents of two of America's major airlines brought their top management personnel and the leaders of the pilots' associations in both companies and announced that serious strikes had been averted on both sides because of the influence in their companies in recent weeks of the program of moral rearmament.

Mr. W. A. Patterson, president of United Air Lines, said that the strike which would have taken place but for this new spirit in his company would have cost at least $12,000,000. It would be an interesting speculation, Mr. Speaker, to visualize how many millions—perhaps even billions—might be saved this Government in its present mobilization effort if such a spirit of honesty, teamwork, and unselfish cooperation and patriotism were to be multiplied throughout the length and breadth of this land.

However, Mr. Speaker, this is not the purpose of these remarks. For in addition to the many outstanding Americans who attended this conference a number of very prominent and distinguished leaders of government, industry, and the military from 22 countries came especially to participate in this assembly and to bring evidence of moral rearmament at work in critical areas of the world.

These high-ranking visitors have made an important contribution to us. We trust that their visit to these shores has also been of some help to them, and as they return to their lands we may continue to work together in the common cause to which we are dedicated.

These distinguished delegates are visiting us today on Capitol Hill and I am glad to have this high honor of giving them the recognition in this House which is their due.

I cannot mention all of them as I would like to do but I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to include a list of their names.

The British delegation includes a number of prominent generals and admirals who served with distinction in both world wars. They include Rear Adm. Sir

Edward Cochrane, wartime commodore of North Atlantic convoys, and Maj. Gen. S. Kirby, former deputy chief of staff for the Control Commission of Germany. Others from Britain include prominent industrialists as well as a number of labor leaders from the London and Glasgow docks and the Ford Motor Co. of England. These dock workers have reported that because of moral rearmament the Communists are no longer able to paralyze the life line of Britain with costly strikes, and these reports have been made here by some of the very men who fomented those conflicts before meeting moral rearmament.

France, that pivot country in European defense, also sent a number of noted military leaders as well as prominent representatives of government and industry. Lt. Gen. J. Touzet du Vigier, wartime commander of the First French Armored Division and who until 1947 was chief of staff to Gen. De Lattre de Tassigny, was sent as the official delegate from the French Government to the Moral Rearmament Assembly. Other French delegates include Maj. Gen. H. de Vernejoul, wartime commander of the Fifth Armored Division; Mr. Robert Prigent, Vice President of the National Assembly and Minister of Health under five Prime Ministers; and Mr. Joseph Wasmer, an MRP Deputy in the National Assembly and close associate of Foreign Minister Robert Schuman.

The delegation which perhaps most caught the attention of the press was the one from Germany. For in addition to men like Dr. Hermann Katzenberger, Secretary of the Upper House of the Bonn Parliament, and Mr. Hans Dutting, a director of the Gelsenkirchen Coal Mining Co., there are a number of former Communists who have begun to fight effectively for democracy, and who have left the party because they have been convinced by what they call the superior ideology of moral rearmament. Since breaking off their affiliation with the Communist Party these men have suffered a great deal of persecution from their former comrades, and the party has officially ordered its members to have nothing to do with moral rearmament, so fearful is the Communist leadership of the ideological inroads already made into their ranks by this dynamic, democratic faith.

The Italian delegates report similar encouraging progress in their country.

The efficient Netherlands sent three leading industrialists: Herman Hintzen, president of a leading Rotterdam bank; Mr. Fritz Philips, of Philips Radio Corp.; and Mr. Charles Redele, president of the Victoria Biscuit Co.

Charming and industrious Switzerland also sent an outstanding delegation, including Mr. Gottlieb Duttweiler, leader of the Independent Party in the Federal Parliament and president of a large chain stores company; Mr. Rudolf Huber, director of a major locomotive works; and Prof. Theophil Spoerri, former rector of Zurich University.

From the Nordic North have come a distinguished group of Navy and Army officers as well as industrialists and labor leaders, including Vice Adm. Yngve Ekstrand, formerly commanding the Swedish Baltic Fleet; Capt. Axel von Heijne, of the Swedish Life Guards; Mr. Heikki Herlin, of Helsinki, a member of the board of directors of Rotary International; and Mr. Alexander Kraft, son of the Foreign Minister of Denmark.

That great Belgian officer, Lt. Gen. A. Lesaffre, represents his country here.

Growing, expanding Brazil sent Ernesto G. Diedrichsen, textile manufacturer, of São Paulo, to name only one of the Latin-American delegates.

Senator Eleanor Butler came as a delegate from Ireland to the conference.

A member of the Burmese Cabinet, the Honorable Mahn Ba Saing, Minister for Karen Affairs, flew especially to Washington for this assembly.

Dr. Heinrich Gleissner, Governor of Upper Austria, and frequently mentioned as a probable successor to the late President Renner, participated in the deliberations.

Other countries represented include British West Indies, Korea, China, India, Indonesia, Japan, Canada, South Africa, Ceylon, and Australia.

Mr. Speaker, the United States has been greatly enriched by the presence of these distinguished visitors and I am sure I express the sentiments of the House in wishing them Godspeed and pledging ourselves to fight along with them in the global struggle for a free and united world.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Friday, January 12, 1951, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, we thank Thee that Thou hast implanted within us the breath of a divine life; that there is an infinite in us which, with all our cunning, we cannot quite conceal beneath the finite; that by the very constitution of our nature, we hunger and thirst after Thee. Forgive us that knowing this we have sought to satisfy the deepest cravings of our spirits with the things of time and sense.

Grant us some part, we beseech Thee, in the fulfillment of Thy mighty purpose for the world. Let Thy hand be laid in healing upon our turbulent day. Show us where we have gone wrong. Enlarge the areas of our sympathy for the want and woe of all mankind. Stir up our wills and kindle our imaginations that we may find the way to a just and ordered society where all will gain the due reward of their labor and where men will serve Thee and one another in harmony and good will. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Monday, January 8, 1951, was dispensed with.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—RESOLUTION OF DELAWARE COUNTY ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE, INC., DELHI, N. Y.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Delaware County Electric Cooperative, Inc., of Delhi, N. Y., urging approval and construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 140—RECOMMENDATION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

Whereas an abundant supply of low-cost electricity is needed for the operation of the Delaware County dairy industry now facing a labor shortage due to defense manpower need; and

Whereas the people of only six other States pay more for electricity in the home than the residents of New York; the industries of New York are burdened with power costs exceeded by but seven other States, and commercial business in New York is charged more for electric power than commercial enterprise in any other State; and

Whereas a large portion of Delaware County farms receive power from an electric cooperative which pays about 50 percent more for wholesale power than similar electric cooperatives throughout the United States; and

Whereas the economy of Delaware County is dependent upon the prosperity of its farm people who are now at a serious competitive disadvantage in relation to farmers in other areas; and

Whereas the northeastern States comprise the largest area in the country having no sizable hydroelectric power development to attract industry and expand farm markets; and

Whereas the abundant low-cost power potentials of the St. Lawrence River are undeveloped due, in a large degree, to controversies in regard to the seaway phase of the proposed project: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of supervisors of the county of Delaware hereby recommends construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project on a self-liquidating basis, and further recommends that provision be made to deliver the power so generated to lead centers where it will be made available to the people of the county of Delaware at the lowest possible cost; and be it further

Resolved, That our duly elected State and Federal representatives be urged to endorse the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, and that copies hereof be forwarded to them and to the Governor of the State of New York; and be it further

Resolved, That construction on the project be started as soon as economic conditions permit.

GOVERNMENT ENCROACHMENT IN FIELD OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE—RESOLUTION OF LIONS CLUB OF CATONSVILLE, MD.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the widespread concern currently felt by a great number of our citizens with regard to Government encroachment in the field of private enterprise is expressed most forcibly in a resolution adopted by the members of the Lions Club of Catonsville, Md., at their regular meeting on January 5, of this year.

Because it represents so completely the views of Maryland citizenry as I have received them and because I am so thoroughly in accord with the sentiments expressed, I send the resolution to the desk for inclusion in the RECORD and appropriate reference.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas America is the product of a people's faith in constitutional law designed to protect the property and enterprises of each citizen from political competition or confiscation; and

Whereas attacks upon this principle have produced many governmental agencies which are now in active conflict with the individual enterprises of the American people; and

Whereas many proposals now before Congress, will, if adopted by a mere majority, further jeopardize the rights of the American people to their individual property and enterprises; and

Whereas the intent and purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution was to prohibit governmental exercise of powers not specifically delegated to it; and

Whereas the intention of the fifth article of the Constitution was to provide a means for the proper delegation of powers to government through a procedure which requires a two-thirds majority of both Houses of Congress and the approval of three-quarters of the States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of Lions Club of Catonsville, Md., in regular session assembled this 5th day of January 1951, exercise our constitutional power to petition the Congress to preserve the intent and purposes of the Constitution by initiating an amendment to the Constitution, for submission to the people of the various States, to provide that, the Government of the United States shall not engage in any business, professional, commercial or industrial enterprise in competition with its citizens except as specified in the Constitution; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this meeting, and that copies of it be sent to (1) the President of the United States, (2) both Members of the United States Senate from this State, (3) Members of the House of Representatives from this and adjacent districts, (4) the Governor of this State, and (5) two copies to the American Progress Foundation, 7179 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles 46, Calif.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—LETTER FROM AMERICAN VETERANS OF WORLD WAR II

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, like other members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I have received this morning a letter from the distinguished national commander of the American Veterans of World War II, Harold Russell. This splendid American has rightly asked the support by the Congress of this great project which has been so long delayed, but which is now so essential in the interest of continental defense. It is utterly fantastic that we should allow ourselves to go without the use of this vital inland artery with its protected route for strategic materials.

I congratulate the officers and members of AMVETS for their continued heart-warming support of this magnificent project, and I assure them that I, for one, will continue the battle for its completion. We hope in the not too distant future to introduce a bill for this objective. I ask unanimous consent that the text of Harold Russell's fine communication be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN VETERANS OF WORLD WAR II,
Washington, D. C., January 2, 1951.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: At our national convention in Cleveland, Ohio, in September

1950, the AMVETS reiterated their stand in support of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. As a veterans' organization, we are vitally interested in the immediate construction of the St. Lawrence project because of the major contributions the project will make to national security.

AMVETS favor the St. Lawrence project because it will greatly add to the economic strength of Canada and the United States. We favor the project because of the need for low-cost St. Lawrence power to help in the expansion of aluminum and other essential defense industries. We favor the project because the protected inland waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of St. Lawrence will save lives and assure us a supply of critical materials, particularly iron ore, in time of war.

This last factor is of great importance to AMVETS. It would be tragic if we are forced to risk the loss of ore boats, Navy convoy ships, and men exposed to submarine attack on the open seas, merely because construction of the seaway is delayed.

We urge that you declare yourself in favor of this project, so important to the lives and security of all Americans.

We should greatly appreciate a reply from you expressing your opinions as to the desirability of undertaking construction of the St. Lawrence project as a part of the mobilization program.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD RUSSELL,
National Commander, AMVETS.

CONTINUATION OF AUTHORITY FOR STUDY OF OPERATIONS OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, I report favorably a resolution to continue until May 1, 1951, the authority to study operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The subcommittee unanimously recommended the resolution, and the members of the full committee who have been available have been polled and have approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received, and under the rule referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The resolution (S. Res. 17) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the authority of the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, under Senate Resolution 219, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to on February 8, 1950 (providing for a study of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries), as continued by Senate Resolution 279, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to on May 19, 1950, and Senate Resolution 307, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to on July 13, 1950, is hereby continued until May 1, 1951, and the limit of expenditures under such resolution is hereby increased by $20,000.

REFERENCE OF COMMUNICATIONS RELATING TO HAZARDOUS EMPLOYMENTS IN FEDERAL AGENCIES

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, so that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service may continue its study with regard to performance ratings and additional compensation for hazardous employments in Federal agencies, I am respectfully requesting that the Senate rerefer to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, of which I am chairman, the following executive communications which were referred to the committee during the Eighty-first Congress:

First. Report to the Senate by the Chairman of the United States Civil Service Commission dated January 31, 1950, on efficiency ratings; and Second. Report to the Senate by the Chairman of the United States Civil Service Commission dated October 26, 1950, on additional compensation for hazardous employments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN BENEFITS TO ARMED FORCES ENGAGED IN KOREA

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], for himself, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr BRICKER], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to extend to personnel of the Armed Forces engaged in Korea certain benefits provided for veterans of World War II, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement explaining the purposes of the bill by the Senator from Washington be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement by the Senator from Washington will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 284) to extend to personnel of the Armed Forces engaged in operations against hostile forces in the Korean theater certain benefits provided by law for veterans of World War II, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. WHERRY for Mr. CAIN (for himself, Mr. HENDRICKSON, and Mr. BRICKER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The statement of Mr. CAIN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

On July 10 of last year the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], and the junior Senator from Washington introduced a bill which would provide to personnel of the Armed Forces engaged in operations against hostile forces in Korea, the same benefits as provided by law for veterans of World War II. The bill was never reported out of the Finance Committee, to which it was referred.

The cruel and bloody war which was in progress in Korea and is in progress today is a war in every sense of that word, despite the official label "police action." There have been more than 40,000 casualties, including 6,761 dead, 27,997 wounded, and 6,148 missing in action.

Certainly no war in the history of our Nation has been more real to the men who are doing our fighting, certainly no war more heartbreaking to the families of these men than is our present so-called police action in Korea. Certainly the Congress of the United States will feel no hesitancy in extending to these soldiers the same care and benefits as were extended to the members of our fighting forces in World War II.

Section 4 of the original bill which would provide insurance benefits, has been struck out of the new bill as these benefits have now been provided by law.

As a part of the record there is included a copy of a letter written by the then Acting Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. E. H. Foley, on December 29, to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Finance Committee, in which it is stated that the Department of the Treasury is in accord with the basic principles of the original bill but suggests certain technical changes. These changes can best be referred to the Finance Committee, which is much better qualified to consider them than is the junior Senator from Washington.

The letter reads, as follows:

"Further reference is made to your letter of July 12, 1950, requesting the views of the Treasury Department on S. 3890., to extend to personnel of the Armed Forces engaged in operations against the forces of the Government of North Korea certain benefits provided by law for veterans of World War II, and for other purposes.

"Section 1 of S. 3890 provides that any active service performed by members of the Armed Forces against North Korean forces shall be deemed to entitle such members to receive all benefits, under laws and regulations administered by the Veterans' Administration, as if this service had been performed during World War II. Section 2 would extend to such persons certain benefits of national service life insurance, which were available only to persons serving in World War II. Section 3 would extend to such persons the educational benefits, loan guaranties, employment privileges, and readjustment allowances provided for by the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, with limitations to prevent duplication. Section 4 would reinstate to such persons family allowances as provided for in the Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act of 1942. Section 5 would extend to such persons certain benefits of the Housing Act of 1937, as amended, relating to low-rent-housing projects.

"The Treasury Department is in accord with the basic principles of this proposed legislation, but is of the opinion that these meritorious objectives may not be achieved entirely in case S. 3890 is enacted. The bill would limit its benefits to those who become actively engaged against North Korean forces. Such a provision would be extremely difficult to administer and would inevitably result in denial of benefits to deserving individuals. Section 4 should no longer be considered inasmuch as Public Law 771 of the Eighty-first Congress has dealt fully with the problem of family allowances.

"The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

"Very truly yours,

"E. H. FOLEY,

"Under Secretary of the Treasury."

The junior Senator from Washington is confident that the bill will receive the just and prompt consideration it deserves.

HOUSING AND COMMUNITY FACILITIES AND SERVICES FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to assist the provision of housing and community facilities and services required in connection with the national defense, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement and synopsis prepared by the Senator from South Carolina which analyze the bill be printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement and synopsis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 349) to assist the provision of housing and community facilities and services required in connection with the national defense, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The statement and synopsis by Senator MAYBANK are as follows:

A STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAYBANK ON THE DEFENSE HOUSING AND COMMUNITY FACILITIES AND SERVICES BILL OF 1951

The defense housing and community facilities and services bill of 1951 is intended to equip the Federal Government to plan and develop housing and community facilities concurrently with plans for defense installations, and is sufficiently broad and flexible to meet various conditions, ranging from rapid expansion of activity in defense areas to major installations in nonindustrial areas, such as the Atomic Energy Commission's Savannah River project and others in Kentucky, New Mexico, Idaho, and other States.

The bill carries provisions for special FHA insurance for housing for defense workers, authority for federally financed housing where defense needs cannot otherwise be met, and Federal assistance to communities to provide community facilities and services for defense installations and workers.

The bill also authorizes Federal acquisition, development, and planning of land for housing, community facilities, and defense installations in relatively isolated areas to prevent land speculation and uneconomic use of land. Such property would then be disposed of to private and public developers for actual construction.

Other provisions of the bill include additional authorization for FHA mortgage insurance programs, extension of FHA's authority to insure loans for military housing and includes also loans for housing for atomic energy installations, authorizes loans for prefabricated housing in the interests of defense, and amends existing law to enable federally aided low-rent public housing to serve defense purposes where needed.

The bill authorizes the FHA to insure up to an additional $3,000,000,000 in mortgages, principally for housing in defense areas, under its various mortgage insurance programs, including the proposed special defense housing title. The President would determine the maximum amounts to be used for the various FHA mortgage insurance titles under the National Housing Act. The bill also would authorize an appropriation for a revolving fund of $10,000,000 for acquisition and development of land for defense facilities in isolated areas, and would authorize loans up to $15,000,000 for the production and marketing of prefabricated housing in order to maintain current housing prefabrication capacity for use in meeting defense needs. Funds for federally financed housing and aid for community facilities and services would be determined by Congress through appropriations.

The bill would place over-all administrative responsibility for the program in the Housing and Home Finance Administrator, subject to the President's determination as to defense requirements. The President could transfer to other agencies certain functions relating to community facilities and services where this would more effectively serve defense needs.

The program will rely primarily on private enterprise in the field of housing and on local communities and agencies for provision and operation of community facilities and services, with direct Federal financing and operation to be used only where defense needs cannot otherwise be adequately served.

The bill would provide for payments in lieu of taxes to local and State taxing jurisdictions for federally owned defense housing and for service payments for community services to defense installations and related housing and other developments.

The bill would also call for federally financed housing, as far as feasible, to be one to four-family permanent structures, available for individual sale to occupants and veterans when defense needs permit, and for any temporary needs to be met with housing that can be moved and reused in other locations.

Hearings on the bill will begin at 10:30 a. m., Tuesday, January 16.

A SYNOPSIS OF THE KEY PROVISIONS OF THE DEFENSE HOUSING AND COMMUNITY FACILITIES AND SERVICES BILL OF 1951

Policy: The bill sets forth a policy of planning concurrently with the planning of defense facilities for necessary housing and community facilities and services to support them; for providing such housing through private enterprise, as far as practical, with Government help if needed, and for provision and operation of community facilities and services by local agencies wherever possible, with Federal aid if needed; for the provision and operation of housing and community facilities and services directly by the Federal Government only where they cannot be otherwise provided; for permanent construction of one- to four-family units for defense housing, as far as practicable, and for their sale to occupants and veterans as soon as possible consistent with national defense requirements.

The bill contains five titles, as follows:

TITLE I

This provides a new title IX to the National Housing Act, for special FHA mortgage insurance for privately financed defense housing, to be used in addition to existing FHA programs in defense areas.

The President would determine the maximum amount of mortgages that could be insured under this new title out of a total maximum authorization of an additional $3,000,000,000 authorized in title V of this bill for new commitments on all FHA mortgage insurance programs under the National Housing Act. (See further explanation under title V in this summary.)

The new title IX of the National Housing Act would be available only in areas designated by the President as having or about to have need of housing for defense purposes. The Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency would determine the maximum number of units to be insured under this title in any such area.

Workers in defense activities would have priority in the purchase or rental of such housing.

The FHA Commissioner could require that any housing insured under this title be held for rental so long as he determines that this is necessary to serve defense needs and could prescribe maximum rentals and rate of return on such housing.

Terms for insured mortgages on one- and two-family units (sec. 903): 90 percent of FHA appraised value, maximum maturity 25 years, maximum interest 4½ percent. Maximum mortgage amount, $8,100 for one-family, $15,000 for two-family residences, except that the FHA Commissioner could increase these amounts by $900 each for a third and fourth bedroom where necessary to maintain sound standards for larger units.

Terms for multifamily projects (sec. 908): 90 percent of FHA appraised value, but not more than the FHA estimate of cost, maximum term to be prescribed by FHA, maximum interest, 4 percent; maximum single mortgage, $5,000,000; maximum mortgage amount per unit, $8,100, or $7,200 if the units average less than four rooms.

TITLE II

This title authorizes the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency to provide with Federal funds housing for defense workers and assist in providing or provide community facilities and services required for defense operations where they would not otherwise be provided.

The title authorizes appropriations for this purpose, with the amounts to be determined by the Congress through usual appropriation processes.

Defense housing: Such housing would be available for occupancy by workers and military personnel. To the maximum extent possible, this housing would be one- to four-family structures of permanent construction, suitable for sale as individual structures. Where located in places where the duration of need appears temporary, the housing would be so constructed as to be capable of being moved and reused in other locations.

Cost limit would be $9,000, with an additional $1,000 each for a third and fourth bedroom. Such limits could be increased by the President by one-third in the Territories.

Such housing would be sold as soon as possible in the public interest and consistent with defense use, with preference to occupants and veterans, or, in multifamily structures, to cooperatives of veterans and occupants.

Full payments in lieu of taxes would be authorized on such property.

Rents to be charged would be fair rents based on value.

Community facilities and services: The title would authorize the Administrator to make loans, grants, and other payments to communities to provide, operate, and maintain community facilities and provide community services needed for defense purposes. Federal grants and payments would be authorized to the extent that the community's costs result from defense activities and are not recovered through increased tax or service revenues. The Federal Government would be authorized to maintain and operate community facilities only when it is not feasible for this to be done through local agencies.

The President would be authorized to transfer from the Housing Administrator to other agencies certain functions relating to community facilities and services functions if he considered this to be in the interest of the defense effort.

TITLE III

To prevent land speculation or uneconomic use of land which would impair the defense effort, this title would authorize the Administrator, upon a finding of the President, to acquire and develop land for housing and community facilities needed in connection with a defense installation in a relatively isolated area, and, where the President found it desirable, to acquire land for the defense installation itself.

The use of such land would be planned, necessary site improvements would be provided for, and the land would then be disposed of to private and public agencies for actual construction. No funds under this title could be used to erect any buildings.

Payments in lieu of taxes are authorized, such payments to take into consideration the services rendered by the taxing jurisdictions to the defense installation and related housing and other facilities.

The title authorizes the appropriation of not more than $10,000,000 to a revolving fund in the Treasury and requires the payment of interest upon any advances from such fund.

TITLE IV

For the purpose of maintaining the operations and the present capacity of housing prefabricators to be available for use in meeting defense housing needs, this title authorizes loans and commitments up to $15,000,000, outstanding at any time, to be made for the production and distribution of prefabricated housing.

TITLE V

Title V contains the new authorization for FHA mortgage insurance programs and various miscellaneous and technical amendments to existing housing legislation.

FHA authorization: The bill authorizes the FHA to insure a maximum of $3,000,000,000 in additional mortgages under all its mortgage-insurance programs for defense and regular housing. This includes any additional authorization that may be needed for small homes under section 8, title I, of the National Housing Act; sale, rental, and cooperative housing under title II; military and atomic energy housing under title VIII, and defense housing under the new title IX proposed in the bill. The President would determine the maximum authorization within the $3,000,000,000 over-all limit that could be used for any of these FHA mortgage-insurance titles.

The miscellaneous amendments in title V of the new bill that are of general interest are:

Perfecting amendments to existing law to permit the use of housing under the federally aided low-rent public-housing program to be more effectively geared to defense needs, where necessary.

Extension of the availability of FHA mortgage insuring authority for loans on military housing under title VIII, National Housing Act, from July 1, 1951, to July 1, 1953. The use of such mortgage insurance would also be made available for housing serving atomic energy installations.

Authority for the President to extend time limits set in the Housing Act of 1950 for applications and actions to be taken in the disposition of federally owned World War II housing.

Designation of an appointee of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Federal National Mortgage Association.

Perfecting amendments to title VII of the National Housing Act to make FHA insurance of yields or direct investments in moderate-priced rental housing more workable in a defense economy.

SALARIES AND EXPENSE ALLOWANCES OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, SPEAKER, AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill relating to the salaries and expense allowances of the President, Vice President, and Speaker and Members of Congress, and I ask unanimous consent that I may speak in explanation of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the Senator from Delaware may proceed.

The bill (S. 357) relating to the salaries and expense allowances of the President, Vice President, and the Speaker and Members of Congress, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. President Truman has said that the people of our Nation must be taxed "until it hurts" in order that we might carry out our rearmament program. In the face of the substantial increase in expenditures which will be required, no one will dispute the fact but that taxes in 1951 will be increased substantially. However, when the President made the statement that taxes must be increased until it hurts, I venture to say that there are millions of American taxpayers who think they are already being hurt and that any increased burden will mean great hardship.

In view of the fact that such an increase does seem inevitable, I think the best way in which some of the sting from any prospective tax increase could be diminished would be to first convince the American people that we as Members of Congress, as well as the President of the United States, are willing to pay our proportionate part of the tax increases.

This can only be accomplished by repealing the present unfair special $50,000 tax exemption to the President, the special $10,000 tax exemption extended to the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, and the special $2,500 tax exemption extended to each Member of Congress. These exemptions in each instance are in addition to the usual exemptions which all taxpayers get.

As you all know, the President's special tax exemption has nothing to do with his regular expense allowance which includes such items as the yacht, The Williamsburg; the winter home in Florida; the airplane, The Independence; which are at his constant command, plus the expenses of the White House in Washington and any transportation expenses which are interpreted as nonpolitical—which includes all trips.

In addition, another $40,000 is set aside to cover other expenses.

It is not the amount of revenue involved in this case—it is more a matter of principle. Our country was established on the basis that we would recognize no privileged group, and extension or continuation of these special tax benefits to the top officials might well mark the departure from that principle.

The President of the United States, Members of Congress, and other top officials of the executive branch of our Government are responsible for the fiscal affairs of our country. We as policy makers authorize these large expenditures which necessitate increased tax rates amounting in some instances to near confiscation. I think it is a healthy condition for our own good and particularly for the good of our country that we as officials of the Government suffer along with the other taxpayers.

For this reason I send to the desk a bill which would repeal such special privileges, thereby placing the President, the Vice President, and the Members of Congress on the same basis as all other American taxpayers.

While I recognize that the Senate cannot initiate tax bills, I am introducing this bill as a matter of record and serving notice that it will be reintroduced as a part of any future tax legislation coming from the House.

As the Eighty-second Congress takes control in this critical year 1951, the President of the United States, the Vice President, and all Members of Congress should take this pledge: "We will place upon the American people no heavier burdens than we are willing to carry ourselves."

BIPARTISAN NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish a bipartisan National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations in which all levels of government are represented to study those problems in our Federal, State, and local governments which make for overlapping services, duplication of effort, and sheer waste in tax dollars, and

I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement in reference thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the Senator from New Jersey may proceed.

The bill (S. 437) to establish a National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, introduced by Mr. HENDRICKSON (for himself, Mr. O'CONOR, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HUNT, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. BREWSTER, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. CARLSON, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. TOBEY, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, and Mr. IVES) was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. This bill represents the views and expresses the considered judgment of many Members of this body who have served in State government. It is a result of their experience at local and State levels of government that it now comes before us for study, consideration, and appropriate action.

The activities and the deep interest shown by the members and the experts of the Council of State Governments in this matter over the past years clearly demonstrates that there is a definite need for the study established by this bill.

This bill, Mr. President, as I have indicated, provides for the establishment of a bipartisan or, better still, a nonpartisan Commission on Intergovernmental Relations which will examine all aspects and phases of national, State, and local government with special attention to the serious fiscal problems which threaten to overwhelm us today. While it may be true that there have been many studies in this general field in the past, none of them have had the full participation of our National Government.

Under this bill, the Commission will represent all of the parties in interest, both public and private, Federal, State, and local, legislative and executive, and where necessary, judicial. It will be given the opportunity and the responsibility to report its findings to the people of the Nation.

It is not intended that this group shall lend itself to any criticism of the basic structure of government levels as we know them, or to their general purposes, but it is our intention that we improve the services of government at each level and at the same time, stretch the value of the tax dollar in respect to the rendition of those services.

When the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts introduced the bill to establish the Commission on Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government, he said:

> This is not a job which Congress alone, working through congressional committees and using its own staffs, can do. We in Congress have not the time. There is no use deluding ourselves about that. We have not the time to do the job that needs to be done. We would have to leave it to our staffs; and our staffs would not have the standing which the members of this Commission would have in relation to the departments. * * * All sorts of expert knowledge would be required, including the services of industrial engineers and management experts. It would take time and money.

I most heartily agree that such an undertaking requires full-time work from many experts of proven ability in the several fields we propose to study.

Since this bill envisages a full-scale investigation on all levels of government, it is necessary to include representatives of local and State governments, Members of Congress, administrative officials, and men and women from private life.

The purposes as stated in the bill itself open exciting vistas for tremendous progress in efficient and effective government. To me, they spell new opportunities to employ sound economic and scientific business methods in public operations.

The entire world watches us day by day as we conduct our public affairs. To friends and foes alike, we are the outstanding example of the democratic processes of government. If we are to prosper and be worthy of the hopes of those who trust and rely upon us, we must be eternally vigilant that our system does not become fatally enmeshed in coils of its own construction.

The time is long overdue for an undertaking such as this—indeed, our present situation demands positive and definite action.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the text of the bill (S. 437) introduced by Mr. HENDRICKSON (for himself and other Senators) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established a national bipartisan commission, in which the various levels of government are represented, to be known as the National Commission of Intergovernmental Relations (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"). In view of the constantly increasing complexity, during the last century and a half, of a vast network of relationships among the Federal, State, county, and municipal governments in the United States, this Commission is established for the purpose of studying and making recommendations to the President and the Congress, in an effort to bring about—

(1) the finding of ways and means of establishing a more orderly and less competitive fiscal relationship between the several levels of government. Major aspects of this problem include the overlapping and confused systems of taxation and the increasing demands made upon the Federal Government and the States for tax-sharing and grants-in-aid, without following any consistent over-all pattern;

(2) the elimination of duplication and overlapping services, activities, and functions, and the securing of a better coordination of such services, activities, and functions among the several levels of government;

(3) the attainment of such an allocation of governmental functions among the several levels of government as will contribute to economy in governmental administration on the one hand, and maximum service to the public on the other;

(4) a reduction in the total governmental expenditures to the lowest possible level consistent with the efficient performance of essential services, activities, and functions;

(5) the development, within the existing constitutional framework, of a governmental structure, and such cooperative policies and procedures as will tend to overcome existing obstacles to efficient governmental administration, and to lay a sound foundation for future development.

SEC. 2. (a) The Commission shall be composed of 14 members, as follows:

(1) Five appointed by the President of the United States, two of whom shall be officers of the executive branch of the Government and three of whom shall be private citizens, all of whom shall have had experience with or knowledge of major problems in the field of intergovernmental relations;

(2) Two appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be Members of the Senate;

(3) Two appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall be Members of the House;

(4) Two appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be State officials, from a panel of at least four, submitted by the Council of State Governments;

(5) Two appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be municipal officials, from a panel of at least four, submitted jointly by the American Municipal Association, the International City Managers Association, and the United States Conference of Mayors;

(6) One appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be a county official, from a panel of at least two, submitted by the National Association of County Officials.

(b) Of the members enumerated in paragraph (1) of subsection (a), not more than three members shall be from any one political party; of each class of members enumerated in paragraphs (2), (3), (4), and (5) of subsection (a), not more than one member shall be from any one political party.

(c) Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(d) The Commission shall elect a Chairman and a Vice Chairman from among its members.

(e) Seven members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the Commission—

(1) to make a thorough and comprehensive study of the subjects listed below, and of any related subjects, with a view to determining what changes in existing relationships, in its opinion, are necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes set forth in section 1 of this act—

(A) the origin and development, and present status, of the relations and interrelations of the Federal, State, and local governments of the United States;

(B) the allocation of governmental functions among the Federal, State, and local governments of the United States;

(C) the problem of geographical areas as related to governmental functions, field administration, and metropolitan communities;

(D) the gradual encroachment upon our Federal system of current and impending developments in the fiscal relations of the Federal Government with the States, and of the States with their political subdivisions;

(2) to submit its final report and recommendations to the President and the Congress on the subjects indicated above, and suggest plans and procedures for carrying these recommendations into effect, not later than February 1, 1953.

SEC. 4. (a) The Commission may, in carrying out this act, hold such hearings and take such testimony, sit and act at such times and places as it deems advisable. Any member of the Commission may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Commission. The Commission may delegate the powers conferred by this subsection to any member or to a group of members of the Commission.

(b) The Commission is authorized to secure from any department, agency, or independent instrumentality of the executive branch of the Government any information it deems necessary to carry out its functions under this act; and each such department, agency, or instrumentality is authorized and directed to furnish such information to the Commission, upon request made by the Chairman or vice chairman.

(c) The Commission shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of a Director of Research and all other necessary personnel without regard to the civil-service laws, and without reference to political affiliations, solely on the ground of fitness to perform the duties of their office.

SEC. 5. (a) Members of the Commission, other than those to whom subsections (b) and (c) of section 2 are applicable, and within the provisions of subsection (c) of section 5, shall receive compensation at the rate of $50 per day for each day they are engaged in the performance of their duties as members of the Commission, and shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties as members of the Commission.

(b) Members of the Commission who are Members of Congress shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as Members of Congress; but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties as members of the Commission.

(c) Each member of the Commission from the executive branch of the Government shall receive, in addition to the compensation for duties performed in the executive branch, $50 per day for each day he is engaged in the performance of his duties as a member of the Commission: Provided, however, That his total aggregate annual salary shall not exceed $12,500; and shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of his duties as a member of the Commission.

SEC. 6. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. The Commission shall cease to exist at the end of the fiscal year during which its final report to the President and the Congress is made.

EXTRA COMPENSATION FOR CERTAIN WORK BY CUSTOMS OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the payment of extra compensation for certain work heretofore performed by customs officers and employees, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me in connection with the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 444) to provide for the payment of extra compensation for certain work heretofore performed by customs officers and employees, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The statement presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

A gross inequity exists at the present time among men in the Customs Service who have performed inspectional duties at our ports of entry during the past 20 years. Because these men are expected to work long hours and on days when other Federal employees do not work, there are long-standing statutes which provide that they shall be paid at premium rates for these extra services. In 1920 and 1922 the basic extra pay acts for such customs work were revised to broaden their scope and to fix the rates at which the men were to be paid. But the inspectors did not receive the benefits intended by these changes. It was not until 1944, after 15 years of controversy with the administrative department, followed by 7 years of litigation, that the customs men finally secured a decision by the United States Supreme Court which established their right to be paid for the services at the rates written into the law in the early twenties. This Supreme Court decision in 1944 allowed the inspectors whose cases were before the Court to recover unpaid amounts to which they were entitled back to September 1, 1931.

A few months after the Supreme Court decision in 1944 the Congress passed Public Law 328, which stated that all unpaid services by customs inspectors performed prior to that time were to be paid in accordance with the Supreme Court's decision. Following enactment of the 1944 act, the Treasury Department and Bureau of Customs led the inspectors to believe that all who had performed the same kind of services after September 1, 1931, would be treated alike, even though they did not file formal claims or suits. Many employees relied on this and did not file claims with the General Accounting Office or the Court of Claims.

It later developed that the 1944 act was considered not sufficiently implemented to make it possible for any existing agency actually to make back payments in full. But this view of the act was not made apparent for a number of years. In the interim a great many men lost altogether the right to recover amounts they had earned. Others who filed formal claims have been paid in part.

The over-all result is that, among inspectors who performed identical services, some have been paid back to September 1, 1931, in full, some in part, and some not at all. The purpose of this legislation is to provide for payment to all inspectors with similar claims of amounts which they earned under the law but have never received. To carry out this purpose a committee is created with the authority and duty to direct a determination of the amounts which are payable and certify such amounts back to the Congress. The work of examining and auditing records is left with the Bureau of Customs, which is to perform this function under the guidance of the committee.

JOINT SELECT COMMITTEE ON ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference a concurrent resolution to establish a joint select committee on the organization of Congress, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me, together with a letter addressed to me by the National Committee for Strengthening Congress, Washington, D. C., signed by Robert Heller, chairman, and an editorial from the Washington Post of January 9, 1951, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the letter and editorial presented by the Senator from Minnesota will be printed in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3) was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there is hereby established a Joint Select Committee on the Organization of Congress, to be composed of 14 members, as follows: Seven members who are members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of the Senate, four from the majority party and three from the minority party, to be chosen by such committee; and seven members who are members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of the House of Representatives, four from the majority party and three from the minority party, to be chosen by such committee.

SEC. 2. The joint committee shall make continuing studies of the organization and operation of the Congress of the United States and shall recommend improvements in such organization and operation with a view toward strengthening the Congress, simplifying its operations, improving its relationships with other branches of the United States Government, and enabling it better to meet its responsibilities under the Constitution. These studies shall include, but shall not be limited to, the operation of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946; the organization and operation of each House of the Congress; the relationship between the two Houses, the relationships between the Congress and other branches of the Government; the employment and remuneration of officers and employees of the respective Houses and officers and employees of the committees and Members of Congress; the structure of, and the relationships between the various standing, special, and select committees of the Congress; and the rules, parliamentary procedure, and practices of each House.

SEC. 3. All bills, resolutions, and other matters in the Senate or the House of Representatives relating primarily to changes in the organization or operation of the Congress shall be referred to the joint committee: Provided, That the existing jurisdiction of the Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate, the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives shall remain unimpaired.

SEC. 4. The members of the joint committee who are Members of the Senate shall report to the Senate and the members of the joint committee who are Members of the House of Representatives shall report to the House, not later than July 31, 1952, by bill or otherwise, their recommendations with respect to matters within the jurisdiction of their respective Houses which are (a) referred to the joint committee or (b) otherwise within the jurisdiction of the joint committee.

SEC. 5. Vacancies in the membership of the joint committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the joint committee and shall be filled in the same manner as in the case of the original selection. The joint committee shall select a chairman and a vice chairman from among its members.

SEC. 6. The joint committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such places and times, to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure such printing and binding, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words.

SEC. 7. The joint committee is empowered to appoint and fix the compensation of such experts, consultants, technicians, and clerical and stenographic assistants as it deems necessary and advisable.

The statement, letter, and editorial presented by Mr. HUMPHREY are as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

I am today joining Congressman HOLIFIELD, of California, in introducing for appropriate reference a joint resolution to establish a Joint Select Committee on the Organization of Congress. The joint committee would be authorized to continue the work so well begun by the La Follette-Monroney committee during the Seventy-ninth Congress. The work of that former committee, and the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 which it fathered, went far to strengthen the internal organization and operation of our national legislature. But the experiences of the last 3 years, and especially of the past session, have led most of us, I think, on both sides of the aisle and in both Houses, to believe that much remains to be done to increase the efficiency of the legislative branch of the Government.

The current defense emergency makes it all the more crucial that the Congress of the United States examine its internal organization so as to act effectively during times of emergency.

In the procedures of our committees, in the staffing of Congress, in the lightening of our onerous workload, in the performance of the oversight function, in controlling public expenditures, and in the regulation of lobbying, there is much room for improvement.

In these as well as in other respects, the reorganization of Congress to keep it abreast of the requirements of the times is a continuing problem which demands continuous attention. Our resolution, therefore, provides for a select committee which would make continuing studies of the organization and operation of the Congress and recommend improvements therein with a view to strengthening the Congress, simplifying its operations, and improving its relationships with the other branches of the Government. The executive branch of the Government is in process of reorganization after the disruptive influences of the late war. As a coordinate branch of the Government, Congress must also be organized and equipped to perform its vital functions effectively.

The joint committee would be composed of seven Members of the Senate and seven Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed from the Senate and the House Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. Not more than four Members of either group could be chosen from the same political party.

The joint committee would not be barred from studying and making recommendations with regard to the rules and parliamentary procedures of either House. Such a prohibition was imposed upon the La Follette-Monroney committee which was thus not at liberty to suggest any changes in floor procedure. The appalling delays of the past session in the Senate and the unprecedented log-jam of appropriation bills, have convinced many of us that the time has come for a reconsideration of our standing rules. The rules of the Senate have not been revised since 1884—66 years ago. Is there any other mechanism in America that is powered by an 1884 motor? Where would American industry be today if it had not been retooled for 66 years?

The joint committee would have jurisdiction over matters relating to the organization and operation of the Congress, but it would not be authorized to trespass upon the existing jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules and Administration of either House. Like the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, it would have legislative authority to report by bill or otherwise.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR STRENGTHENING CONGRESS, INC.,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1951.

The Honorable HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
The Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: This is our fourth annual letter to the membership of Congress. It is inspired by our deep devotion to representative government and by our earnest desire to strengthen Congress as the chief bulwark of American democracy in a dangerous world. After reviewing the procedural performance of the 1950 session, we find much in its record to praise and some aspects to criticize. We also offer our suggestions of next steps toward a more efficient Congress.

EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION: AN AUDIT OF ITS PERFORMANCE

The Congress which adjourned on September 23, 1950, revealed signs both of strength and weakness in its internal organization and operation. On the credit side were the following developments:

Credits

1. The streamlined structure of the standing committee system was kept intact without change during the session. The reformed structure of the standing committees has now survived four annual sessions of the Congress without successful attack and apparently has won general acceptance.

2. A new "watchdog subcommittee" of the Senate Armed Services Committee was created last July to determine whether or not the administration of the National Defense Establishment is up to maximum efficiency. Its first two reports have been models of penetrating analysis and nonpartisan inquiry in the public interest.

3. A new Joint Committee on Defense Production was established by the Defense Production Act of 1950 to operate as a watchdog committee in its field. We commend the growing use of joint committees and joint action in the performance by Congress of its supervisory functions.

4. Increasing reliance for research, fact finding, and bill drafting upon its own expert staff aids is enabling Congress to do a better job. We applaud the gradual growth of the nonpartisan professional committee staffs, the Legislative Reference Service, and the Office of Legislative Counsel.

5. Congress has put growing emphasis upon performance of its overseer function. Ten standing committees and five special committees were actively engaged during the session in supervising the operations of the Government. The House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities conducted an especially thorough investigation of lobbying methods, improved the registration forms, and paved the way for needed amendments in the lobby law.

6. Consolidation of 11 separate supply bills into one omnibus appropriation bill, for the first time in modern history, was the outstanding procedural experiment of the session. Hitherto, the supply bills have gone through the legislative process one at a time. This year they were merged into one measure which reduced the executive budget by $2,000,000,000 and was ready for the President's signature two full months ahead of the budget completion date in 1949.

7. Passage of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950 was another noteworthy step taken during the session, toward strengthening control over the purse. This act authorizes the performance budget and certain accounting reforms, thus carrying out earlier recommendations of the La Follette-Monroney committee.

8. In floor procedure, the House of Representatives made use on several occasions of its new 21-day rule to break blockades in the Committee on Rules and bring important bills to the floor for action by the whole House.

9. We also noted with approval the introduction of a resolution on August 2, 1950, to amend the Senate's cloture rule to provide for majority cloture, and the introduction of a concurrent resolution on April 26 to establish a joint committee on the organization of Congress in order to continue the work begun by the La Follette-Monroney committee during the Seventy-ninth Congress. We renew our endorsement of both of these proposals.

Debits

On the debit side of the congressional performance sheet, we have noted the following items:

1. The spirit if not the letter of the Legislative Reorganization Act was disregarded during the Eighty-first Congress by the creation of nine special committees, six in the House and three in the Senate.

2. Bills to reform procedures before congressional investigating committees, introduced in both Houses by their majority leaders, failed to advance beyond the subcommittee hearing stage, despite widespread public support for the adoption of a code of fair committee conduct.

3. While noteworthy gains have been achieved in the staffing of Congress, some standing committees are still understaffed in terms of their workload, and some professionals have been appointed on a patronage rather than a merit basis.

4. Congress continued to be handicapped during the second session by a heavy workload of private and local legislation. Fifty-four percent of all laws enacted by the session through September 23, 1950, were private bills dealing mostly with private claims and immigration matters. Half of the States of the Union now delegate the settlement of these private questions to appropriate administrative or judicial authorities. Congress might well do likewise and relieve itself of this burden.

5. Although the Senate approved home rule for the District of Columbia in May 1949, without a dissenting vote, the Eighty-first Congress continued to be saddled with the local business of the District, while the home-rule bill rested in a House District Committee pigeonhole.

6. Demands from the folks back home for all manner of personal services continue to convert our national legislators into errand boys and to divert their attention from more important national and international legislative matters. The services of administrative assistants are not being fully utilized to relieve Members of home State business.

7. In the fiscal control field, the chief setback of the session was the failure to enforce the legislative budget provision of the Reorganization Act of 1946. After ineffectual efforts in earlier sessions, the legislative budget this year was ignored. If this condition continues, it may become defunct.

8. The House spent 192 hours during the session on 145 quorum calls and 143 yea-and-nay votes—the equivalent of 32 legislative days. Most of this time could have been saved by electric voting.

9. In the Senate, the first trial of the new cloture rule, adopted last year, proved that it would be even less effective than the old 1917 rule in breaking filibusters in that body. Efforts to end a filibuster against the FEPC bill failed by a margin of 12 votes, despite claims that the new cloture rule would be more effective in limiting debate than the old rule. Unlimited and irrelevant debate in the Senate was largely responsible for keeping Congress in session for almost 2 months beyond the July 31 dead line set by the Reorganization Act of 1946.

10. Long-standing abuse of the "leave to print" and franking privileges reached new heights during the Eighty-first Congress.

Matter inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under this privilege during the first session occupied five huge volumes and consumed 6,800 pages. For the second session through October 20, the Appendix ran to 7,734 pages. At the current printing cost of $82 a page, the extensions and insertions of the Eighty-first Congress through October 20, 1950, thus cost the taxpayers, $1,191,788. Wholesale use of the franking privilege by private lobbies was disclosed at hearings held in June 1950 by the House Committee on Lobbying Activities.

11. Absenteeism, both in committee and on the floor, was especialy conspicuous during the second session. The Senate granted its Members 265 individual leaves of absence, and the House granted 284 leaves of absence through September 8, a total of 549 leaves of absence granted by both Houses up to that time.

Next steps toward strengthening Congress

In the light of the foregoing audit of its recent performance, we strongly recommend that the Eighty-second Congress take the following steps toward strengthening its internal organization and operation:

1. Create machinery for continuing improvement.
2. Further trial of the consolidated appropriation bill procedure and the legislative budget.
3. Adopt majority cloture and a rule of relevancy in the Senate.
4. Keep the 21-day rule in the House and vote by electricity.
5. Plug the loopholes in the lobby law.
6. Increase party responsibility.
7. Reduce the extraneous work load on Congress.

Create Joint Committee on Organization of Congress

We renew our recommendation made last year that a Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress be established. The work of the La Follette-Monroney committee and the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 which it fathered went far to strengthen internal organization and operation. But the experience of the last 4 years, and especially of the past Congress, indicates that the process of improvement should be a continuous one and that much remains to be done to increase efficiency. In controlling public expenditures, in performing the overseer function, in the staffing of Congress, in committee and floor procedures, in the regulation of lobbying, and in the lightening of the extraneous workload, there is much room for improvement.

Keep the big money bill and the legislative budget

The consolidated supply-bill procedure falls short of the objectives of the legislative budget we have advocated in the past in that it does not fix a ceiling on Federal expenditures or give a coordinated view of prospective income and outgo. But it is a step in the right direction, and we urge its further trial. The record of its first trial shows, as Senator BYRD has pointed out, "that enactment of the single appropriation bill this year required less time, promoted fuller participation in debate, and resulted in savings rather than increases." After experience with the new procedure, Chairman CANNON, of the House Appropriations Committee, said that "the single appropriation bill offers the most practical and efficient method of handling the annual budget and the national fiscal program. Judged by our experience, there is no legitimate reason which can be advanced against it." We also urge further trial of the legislative budget.

Limited and relevant Senate debate

The efficiency of the Senate continues to be stymied by its practice of unlimited and irrelevant debate: Two weeks and 500 pages of the RECORD to repeal the tax on oleomargarine; 3 weeks to pass the Gas Act, which the President promptly vetoed; 27 roll and quorum calls on the displaced-persons bill after it had been pigeonholed for months; a one-man filibuster for 11 hours on the slot-machine bill at the end of the session.

We again urge the Senate to modernize its antiquated procedures, to adopt an effective cloture rule, and to require its debate to be germane to the pending business: In these perilous times, unlimited and irrelevant debate is a luxury that a busy legislature can no longer afford.

Keep the 21-day rule

Before 1949 the House Rules Committee had power to prevent the House from considering bills favorably reported by its other standing committees. This power, frequently exercised, denied the House its constitutional right to legislate according to the majority will. On January 3, 1949, the House adopted the so-called 21-day rule which enables a legislative committee to bring a bill to the floor of the House after the bill has been pigeonholed in the Rules Committee for 21 days. During 1949 the new 21-day rule was twice used: to bring the anti-poll-tax and rivers and harbors bills to the House floor. The threat of its use forced action on the housing and minimum-wage bills. During 1950 an attempt to repeal the 21-day rule was defeated in the House by a vote of 236 to 183. The basic issue at stake here is whether legislative action shall be controlled by a majority of the House or by a coalition of seven members of the Committee on Rules. It is reported that another attempt to repeal this democratic rule will be made early in the Eighty-second Congress. We urge the Members of the House to reject this attempt just as they did a year ago.

Electric roll call systems are now in successful operation in 16 States where they save much legislative time and shorten the sessions. The national House of Representatives spends 1 month each session answering the roll call. We recommend that this time be saved by the installation of a modern electric roll-call system.

Strengthen the lobby law

In 1946, Congress passed a law which requires all persons whose principal paid activity is seeking to influence the passage or defeat of Federal legislation to register with the Clerk of the House and file quarterly statements of their receipts and expenditures. From the effective date of the lobby law down to the end of 1949, 2,878 organizations filed reports showing contributions received of $55,195,548, and expenditures of $27,431,517 for lobbying purposes. Four hundred and ninety-five different pressure groups filed at one time or another under the law up to 1950.

During 1950 the House Select Committee To Investigate Lobbying Activities conducted an intensive investigation in this field. The committee found that the lobby law was poorly drafted and contained many loopholes, allowing many lobbyists to avoid registration. They also shed much fresh light on lobbying techniques. We urge the Congress to study the reports of this committee and to act favorably upon its proposals for amending and improving the lobby law of 1946.

Increase party responsibility

There is growing realization in this country of the inadequacy of our existing party system and of the need for a more democratic, responsible, and effective party system. We invite your attention in this connection to the recent report of the committee on political parties of the American Political Science Association entitled "Toward a More Responsible Two-Party System." We endorse their proposals for strengthening party responsibility, many of which are consistent with our own suggestions on this subject in the 1945 Heller report, Strengthening the Congress.

A higher degree of party responsibility in Congress calls for the consolidation of the various leadership groups in both the Senate and the House into one truly effective and responsible leadership committee for each party. Each of these four leadership committees should be responsible for—

1. Calling more frequent meetings of the party membership in each House.
2. Submitting policy proposals to the party membership.
3. The selection of committee chairmen and ranking members and the assignment of party members to the standing committees.
4. The scheduling and guidance of legislative traffic on the floor.

The gulf between promise and performance on legislation is traceable, we believe, to party irresponsibility in Congress, to the lack of cooperation between the President and his legislative leaders, weaknesses of leadership, and to the subordination of national to sectional and special interests. Unless these conditions are soon corrected, there is grave danger of the disintegration of the two-party system into a three-party system in Congress, of overextending the Presidency, and of the development of unbridgeable political cleavages in the country.

Reduce the workload

Once again we call attention to the urgent need of reducing the extraneous work load on all Members of Congress. In these times, when Congress must concentrate on momentous international issues and act as a board of directors for our vast Federal establishment, we believe that Congress should divest itself of petty private and local business. The time has come to plug the loopholes in the Federal Tort Claims Act; to delegate the settlement of immigration and deportation cases, 5,000 of which cl[illegible]ed the calendars of your Judiciary Com[illegible]tees during the Eighty-first Congress; to get rid of duties as a city council by granting home rule to the people of Washington; and to make fuller use of administrative assistants on district and home-State business.

We respectfully urge the Eighty-second Congress to consider the above recomemndations seriously and to act upon them promptly.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT HELLER,
Chairman.

[From the Washington Post of January 8, 1951]

A LOOK AT CONGRESS

In surveying the work of Congress last year, the National Committee for Strengthening Congress found that nine commendable steps were taken. The overseer function of Congress was further developed. Appropriations were consolidated into one omnibus bill, and a number of other procedures were improved. The emphasis naturally shifts, however, to the pressing reforms yet to be accomplished. Congress is still far from being the efficient and well-managed lawmaking body that the country ought to have—especially in these critical times.

The House, for example, used up 192 hours—the equivalent of 32 legislative days—in quorum calls and yea-and-nay votes. Most of this time might have been saved by means of an electric voting device. The Senate is still at the mercy of any windbag who can claim the privilege of the floor. It required 2 weeks to repeal the tax on oleomargarine and 3 weeks to pass the gas bill which the President vetoed. The easy-going Senate tolerated an 11-hour filibuster against the slot-machine bill. Senators are still free to talk as long as they can about corn liquor, fairy tales, the sex life of frogs or the craters of the moon, regardless of how urgent prompt action may be. The milk-and-water cloture rule adopted last year has thus far proved no more effective than the old rule which gave free rein to filibusters.

In spite of public pressure, the last Congress failed to prescribe rules of fair procedure for its investigating committees. It continued to fritter away an enormous amount of time on private claims and immigration bills and ordinances for the District of Columbia. Some of its committees still lack professional staffs and various positions created for experts are occupied by political hacks. The committee also found that the franking privilege is grossly abused; the Lobbyist Registration Act is in need of amendment; and many legislators still function as errand-boys for their constituents.

The reformers make a compelling argument for establishment of a Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress. Most of the recent improvements are traceable to the work of the La Follette-Monroney Committee a few years ago. Now it is evident that a continuing effort to keep the organization of Congress abreast of its responsibilities is needed. Perhaps even more important is the plea for consolidation of the various leadership groups in the House and Senate into "one truly effective and responsible leadership committee for each party." We suspect that the performance of Congress could be vastly improved if, as the committee suggests, a unified leadership group in each House selected chairmen and committee members, controlled the legislative program, and arranged frequent meetings for discussion of major questions of policy.

INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES BY COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. RUSSELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 18), which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Resolved, That in carrying out the duties imposed upon it by section 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (Public Law 601, 79th Cong.), the Committee on Armed Services, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the period ending December 31, 1952, to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $115,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL FOR COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 19), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by section 134 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the Eighty-second Congress to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $3,000 (in addition to amounts heretofore made available for such purposes), shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INVESTIGATION OF EXCESSIVE PROFITS MADE DURING WORLD WAR II

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 20), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study with respect to the earnings of war contractors and others making excessive profits during World War II, for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility and desirability, during any future wars in which the United States may be engaged, of limiting annual profits to amounts not in excess of 10 percent of capital investment. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its study together with such legislation as it may deem necessary to carry out its recommendations.

INVESTIGATION OF FOREIGN OIL CONCESSIONS

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 21), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed (1) to conduct a full and complete study and investigation of the granting of oil rights and concessions to United States oil companies by foreign governments and (2) to report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem avisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

SHORTAGE OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION EQUIPMENT

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 22), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to (1) the causes of the existing shortage of railroad equipment for transportation purposes, and (2) means of relieving such shortage. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of such study and investigation, together with its recommendations for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings and to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate in the Eighty-second Congress as it deems advisable.

INVESTIGATION OF CONTRACTS WITH RAILROADS FOR CARRYING MAILS

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 23), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service is authorized and directed (1) to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to contracts with railroads for carrying United States mail with a view to ascertaining whether, in the light of changes in the volume of mail carried, any change in the rates charged for such service is necessary or advisable, and (2) to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its study and investigation together with such recommendations for necessary legislation as it may deem desirable.

INVESTIGATION OF LEASING OF POST-OFFICE QUARTERS AT DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 24), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a thorough study and investigation into the leasing of post-office quarters in and around Detroit, Mich., with a view to determining whether any favoritism or other irregularity has occurred. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

HOSPITALIZATION PROGRAM OF CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 25), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete study and investigation with respect to all matters relating to the desirability and feasibility of instituting a hospitalization program for the benefit of civilian employees of the Government of the United States, such program to include provision for prepayment of hospitalization and surgical costs in hospitals to be designated by such employees to be attended by physicians and surgeons also of their choice.

SEC. 2. The committee is directed to complete its studies and submit a report and recommendations for appropriate legislation not later than May 1, 1951.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings and to act at such times and places during the Eighty-second Congress, to employ such assistants as may be needed and to request such assistance and information from any departments and agencies of the Government, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report the educational material and data on such hearings shall not exceed 25 cents per 100 words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $10,000 for this project, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INVESTIGATION OF PROBLEMS INVOLVING THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference a resolution calling for an investigation of the problems involving the United States merchant marine, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me in connection therewith be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 26), was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

Whereas the United States merchant marine, allied industries, and trained personnel therein are indispensable to national security; and

Whereas geographical dispersion and utilization of repair and construction facilities and the skilled manpower related thereto is essential to national defense and economy; and

Whereas the transfer of American ships and those of other countries to flags of certain nations jeopardizes world-wide stability of the maritime industry; undermines seafarers' and safety-at-sea standards; and deprives the United States Treasury of substantial tax revenues; and

Whereas revival of ship construction and operation in occupied countries is of legitimate interest to the United States merchant marine; and

Whereas participation of American bottoms in transporting United States financed cargoes has been threatened first by failure of certain Government agencies to give proper consideration to the importance of maintaining an adequate United States merchant marine, and second, by actual or proposed use, directly or indirectly, of funds and scarce materials to build or acquire ships for foreign nations; and

Whereas Congress, agencies affected, and industry have found no long-range solution to the problems of water transportation to Alaska and coastwise and interconstal shipping; and

Whereas shipping operations of the armed services bear a definite relationship to the present and future welfare of the United States merchant marine; and

Whereas it is imperative to insure efficient utilization of manpower and shipping resources that the privately owned and operated American merchant marine be properly integrated with the general mobilization effort; and

Whereas it is essential, even in a national emergency, to plan for peacetime operation of the privately owned and operated merchant marine; and

Whereas the administration of our maritime laws and policies by the executive departments is of legitimate concern to the Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete study and investigation of all such matters pertaining to the merchant marine as it may deem proper.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date but not later than March 31, 1952.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable, and is authorized, with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The statement presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

A resolution to investigate the problems involving the United States merchant marine was introduced in the United States Senate today by Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON, Democrat, of Washington, chairman of the Senate subcommittee which conducted an exhaustive study of the merchant marine during 1949–50.

Under the term of the resolution the Senate would establish the subcommittee under the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In presenting his resolution Senator MAGNUSON pointed out that in any period of national emergency the merchant marine is a strong arm for both the Navy and the Army. He also pointed out that there has been a threat to the American merchant marine by failure of certain governmental agencies to give proper consideration to the importance of maintaining an adequate United States merchant marine and also by actual or proposed use of funds and scarce material to build or acquire ships for foreign nations.

Transfer of American ships to flags of certain nations jeopardize world-wide stability of the merchant marine, undermines seafarers and safety-at-sea standards, and deprives the United States Treasury of income-tax revenues. Such transfers need investigation and study, Senator MAGNUSON said.

Senator MAGNUSON also declared that the subcommittee would investigate the problem of transportation involving Alaska, shipping operations of the armed services, efficient utilization of manpower, and the utilization of repair and construction facilities in all areas of the United States.

The subcommittee in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress advocated a long-range shipping program and helped instigate the reorganization of the Maritime Commission in line with the recommendation of the President's Committee on Governmental Reorganization. Its work was lauded by all segments of the industry and also by organized labor.

The resolution introduced today by Senator MAGNUSON would have the committee report not later than March 31, 1952, and provides that the expenses of the committee shall not exceed $50,000.

"It is vital for the successful prosecution of the war effort that we have a strong American merchant marine and that we take every possible step to insure having a strong and growing shipping industry. The work of the proposed subcommittee will be of the greatest possible value to the defense program of the Nation and also will help to insure a strong maritime industry for the Nation," Senator MAGNUSON stated.

APPRAISAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an excellent editorial appearing in the Grand Forks Herald, Grand Forks, N. Dak., on December 31, 1950.

This editorial, by Mr. M. M. Oppegard, the able editor of the Grand Forks Herald, contains, in my opinion, one of the best appraisals of the international situation I have read to date. It seems to me that this is a sane and sensible approach, and I wish to associate myself with his views.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT SEEMS TO ME

The word for today is "phantasmagoric," and I'll beat you to Mr. Webster's sparkling tome by telling you it means "a shifting succession of things seen, imagined, or evoked in the imagination, as by a fever."

That's my boy, as the vernacular has it. The fever is real, and it has been whipped up by the frenzied declarations of folks with access to radio and newspapers, but it is not all a cry of "wolf, wolf."

There is such grave fear of war on a big scale that we find the United States and most of the democratic world greeting a somewhat punch-drunk 1951 on a whirligig of preparedness for a war they do not want.

Ever since the ill-fated Korean adventure hit us in the face last June, we have been looking bug-eyed under every bed, peering furtively around every corner, striving to look beyond every horizon, fearful that we will discover the start of a cataclysmic world war III.

Some say we already are in that war, or are treading its blood-soaked fringes, and our hurried best may not be enough to shape our defenses adequately before the world comes tumbling down about our ears.

We are now winding up 5 years of aimless shadow boxing, clever buck passing, jumbled and elusive foreign relations, bitter political partisanship, and a mess of low-grade performances from the sanctity of the White House.

For those 5 years we have heard the spectral beat of war drums in a cold war, now suddenly warmed to a measure of reality that has us scurrying in every direction, physically and mentally, in a frantic endeavor to make up for lost time.

Phantasmagoria may be too mild a word to describe the current scene, but it does pretty well as far as it goes in giving a rather grim picture of the state of the Union.

Certainly no one knows just where we are heading or even where we are at, for our top authorities on the subject apparently have no special information denied the public as to the status of possible world war III.

We have recently heard the utterances of the President of the United States and three top Republicans in picturing our status and the potentialities of the future.

President Truman, in his December 14 speech to the Nation and the world, gave a general outline of our part for 1951, blaming Russia for the "great danger" to our country and its free institutions.

Governor Dewey, twice defeated Republican candidate for President, the night before had called for the United States to drop its defensive mood and begin the greatest mobilization in its history to combat Communist aggression.

Herbert Hoover, our only living ex-President, on December 20, urged the United States to concentrate on preservation of the Western Hemisphere by holding the Atlantic and Pacific oceans with the island outposts of Britain, Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines.

Then, finally, John Foster Dulles, Republican foreign policy adviser to the State Department, last Friday night countered Hoover's plan with a statement that America can never stand alone as a Gibralter against the world.

Governor Dewey out-Trumaned Truman in his call for preparedness. He would register all men and women over the age of 17 for national service; he wants a 100-division army and an 80-group air force, with the Navy taken out of mothballs and the National Guard federalized immediately.

Dulles would encircle Russia as far as possible with an economic, political, and military ring; then, if all-out war came, the free world will have the capacity to counterattack.

Hoover's view was called isolationist by President Truman, but even Dulles, who also rejected it, said "it is not necessary to spread our strength all around the world in futile attempts to create everywhere a static defense."

This would seem to raise the question of what constitutes "all around the world" and what description fits Dulles' call for a ring around Russia and the Communist countries. Certainly that is not just our back yard.

We can only judge what Mr. Truman means by what we have done under his immediate direction, without congressional debate, and without any mandate from the people.

We have had a fling at fighting communism "wherever it may rear its ugly head," testing our resources in the sorry affair in Korea. We would have done all right there, of course, if the Chinese hordes had not come flooding into the picture.

But we must plan our defenses on a basis adequate to cope with just such contingencies as the Chinese intervention, even though we would be foolish to take on China now as a diversion from the main focal point of Europe.

Indications are we intend to hold the small beachhead at Pusan, if we have the men and matériel to do it, which seems likely, for it's hardly possible for the Chinese to pour in the men needed to offset our air, naval, and artillery power, and have enough left when they get to Pusan to be fully effective.

Hoover may be right in his measurement of our capacity to withstand any Russian invasion of Europe or countries on the Asiatic mainland. Whether his proposal goes too far in limiting our sphere is something this column will not attempt to decide.

I know, however, we must be tremendously strong at home and in our island redoubts before we can hope to make important contributions in manpower to the defense of Europe's mainland.

It would be purposeless to put an inadequate force in Europe, either our own manpower or that of the democratic countries; that would mean only another Korea should Russia decide to march to the Atlantic.

Naturally, a considerable force in the countries of Europe, backed by our air and sea power, might prove a deterrent to Russian aggression. However, Moscow would not strike without almost certainty of success, and there isn't much we can do psychologically to stop her.

We need, then, to be sure that we are prepared for what would come after the overrunning of Europe, for that is when we would be put to the real test. Then, instead of Europe or even Britain, our base of action from the air likely would be north Africa.

One thing is certain: Herbert Hoover's speech has made it apparent that the Eighty-second Congress convening this week will find sharp division over the matter of foreign policy.

There are charges even now that our administration is heading us for another Korea in proposing to send 200,000 Americans and $12,000,000,000 to defend Europe.

The "internationalists," it is declared in congressional circles, have controlled the Democratic Party for more than 30 years and have "dominated the Republican Party" for the past decade.

"They have taken this country into three wars in a generation in pursuance of the dogma that it is the mission of America to police the world," as one "nationalist" put it.

Obviously, there will be unanimous support for all measures for our national defense, but there will be warm debate on the proposal to carry that program to the very doors of Russia by sending big armies to Europe.

Truly, 1951 may be a fateful year. The aspect is darker than it has been on any of the five more recent New Year days. But despite it all, I wish for all a happy New Year, with a prayer that we may come through 1951 reasonably unscathed.

M. M. OPPEGARD.

LETTER FROM A SOLDIER IN KOREA

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to read a one-page letter from a constituent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The letter is as follows:

LEXINGTON, VA., December 29, 1950.

The Honorable A. WILLIS ROBERTSON,
Senate Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ROBERTSON: I just received a letter from my son in Korea and I want to call to your attention the feelings of one of our boys serving on the front lines. He went into Korea on July 8 and is with the — Division. For two weeks he was reported "missing in action" and to use his own words, "I can thank the good Lord. That is all that brought me out." I realize that my son is just one of our fighting men but I believe his feelings represent that of thousands of our men in Korea.

This is what he says: "I suppose things are changing a little in the States since Truman declared a national emergency. I think he was about six months late. I don't see how they expected us to operate an army over here with what little they gave us. Most of our Division is about half strength from the lack of equipment and replacements. I think they should either do the job or move out. They are letting the Chinese make fools out of us. I'm a radio repairman and when I left our detachment they couldn't give me as much as one screwdriver. If I hadn't gotten a few tools on my own I would be useless in case of an emergency. The jeep they gave me had one end of the front bumper hanging loose (said they couldn't get welding equipment), no battery cover, no radiator cap, and I had to pull it to get it started. From this you can see that the American forces over here are doing an exceptionally good job with what little they have." He goes on to say that if some of our Congressmen could experience for a short time what they are having to endure things might be different. Then he closes with these words: "I don't want to sound bitter, but sometimes I just stop to think. I'm okay myself and I don't mind doing my job."

Senator ROBERTSON, I urge you to use your influence to right this deplorable situation. This is certainly not upholding the democratic way of life for which our men in Korea are fighting and dying.

Sincerely yours,

TRIBUTE TO "DOC" WATKINS

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, at this point I desire to pay a tribute which I think is well deserved. Tomorrow one of the members of the Press Gallery retires, after 41 years of service with the Associated Press. Twenty-three of those years he has spent here on the Hill. For the last 13 years he has reported events, developments, and legislation affecting the great and growing Pacific Northwest.

I am speaking of Charles D. Watkins, known so well to the Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives as "Doc." During his 13 years of reporting Pacific Northwest news, "Doc" has become the trusted and respected friend of all congressional Members from the Pacific Northwest States. We admire his work. We respect his judgment. We enjoy giving him a story.

Between 1937 and 1950, tremendous development has occurred in the Pacific Northwest. Woven through "Doc's" stories are the fascinating tales of the Columbia River power, irrigation and navigation program; the building of the gigantic Hanford plant; the development of the military defense installations at Fort Lewis, Bremerton, and elsewhere. "Doc" Watkins, dispatches constitute a "news man's history of the Pacific Northwest."

I personally am proud of the job Watkins has done. I know the Associated Press and its member newspapers are likewise proud of that job.

"Doc" has prided himself on accurate reporting. He has drawn personal satisfaction from seeing the clue, and then following the track that leads to a scoop. He has thrived under the pressure of deadlines.

We are going to miss "Doc's" daily call to our offices. We hope he misses us sufficiently to drop in when he can. We wish him well in his post-retirement days.

COMMITTEE ORGANIZATION

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I do not wish at this time to ask the majority leader what his plans are in regard to when the Senate shall convene after the recess of today's session, but I wish to advise him that I am satisfied that if the majority will be ready to organize the committees tomorrow noon the minority will be glad to cooperate with the majority and proceed with the organization of the committees of the Senate at that time—at noon on tomorrow, Friday.

THE NEED FOR UNITY AND COOPERATION IN THE PRESENT CRISIS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, the President of the United States has now delivered his State of the Union message. Bills and resolutions have been introduced. The time has come for the Senate to go to work.

My colleagues have paid me the signal honor of electing me leader of the majority. I hope to repay their trust by performing my duty as faithfully, as seriously, and as considerately as it can be done. I am fully conscious of the heavy responsibility imposed upon me. My conception of the leadership is to represent carefully and conscientiously the aggregate viewpoint of a majority of this body. In my judgment, one of the functions of the leadership is to bring into accord, so far as is humanly possible, varying opinions and judgments, with the purpose of reaching decisions and objectives that have the approval and support of all—legislative and executive alike.

With that in mind, I desire to pass on to the problems ahead of us, the things we must do. The answer is brief—it can be said in one word—unite! We must stand united against our enemies, foreign and domestic.

It is becoming trite to say these are turbulent times. Men whose judgment we respect have told us that we live in the most dangerous days of the Republic; they say we are at a crossroads; that moments of extreme crisis are ahead of us. No sensible, informed person denies this.

There are, of course, differences of opinion here and throughout the Nation as to what we should have done and what we should do to meet these crises. I do not quarrel with such differences of judgment. They are a proper, even a necessary part of our form of government. It is this clash of honest judgment and conviction threshed out publicly in the press, on the air, and in public and political forums which results in sounder policy. It is in this cauldron that the dross is burned off and the pure gold remains.

But there are no differences of opinion between honest and patriotic citizens that our country, our way of life, our people are the first and paramount concern of all of us.

There are no differences of opinion among us that we must give heed to an evil and sinister concept of government which seems bent on engulfing the world.

There are no differences of opinion among us that rational and civilized methods of dealing with its mentally dwarfed leaders are frustrated and ignored.

There are no differences of opinion among us that we seek peace—peace for us and peace for all peoples; that peace in today's closely knit earth is indivisible, since a threat against peace almost anywhere is a direct threat to our own peace; and that, finally, to bring about that peace, our land must become and remain the strongest military force on earth.

If all of us can agree that these concepts are fundamental; if all of us will stand united now and forever for them; and if all of us will evidence that unity and firmness of purpose so clearly and so loudly that it will be heard around the world, and not misunderstood, we may well avoid that which we and all decent peoples everywhere shun and dread—another world war.

Perhaps I can illustrate briefly what I mean. Historians now tell us that the Kaiser and his cohorts interpreted America's public clash of varying viewpoints from 1914 to 1917 as clear evidence that we would not go to war. They mistook the processes of democracy in action for indecision, fear, or something worse. The same historians assert that had Wilhelm known we would enter the lists against him, he would not have permitted the Germans to plunge the world into the First World War. Already, Mr. President, we have evidence that Hitler possibly, and Mussolini certainly, would have shunned the ruin of the Second World War, had they not misinterpreted the viewpoints of a few of our people to be the judgment of the many. A Japanese admiral, who was that nation's ambassador here, has been quoted as saying that his Government believed our people were soft, not militarily minded, of divided opinion about what our course should be, and that therefore we would not go to war.

Mr. President, I cite these telescoped bits of history merely to emphasize that even though all of us know the facts, and even though all of us agree that we are not going to allow a rampaging communism to push us to the wall, the masters in the Kremlin may not understand; they may, in fact, already have misinterpreted the free expression of views here as an evidence of indecision, weakness, division, and disunity.

My purpose, therefore, is to urge upon my colleagues a constant awareness of this situation in whatever they say and do; to remember that we have been misjudged in the past, and probably are being misjudged today. Always, the war makers have believed we were split, divided, irresolute, and weak. Always, that belief, however erroneous, has either directly or indirectly been responsible for plunging the world into war.

All of us know that we are resolute in our purpose to resist the military or economic threat of the Soviet; that there is a point beyond which we will not be pushed. On this we are united as one. We have taken steps, by majority vote, which should make clear to the blindest that we will not be coerced or intimidated. Perhaps we can make that fact clearer by taking action here which will emphasize our previous affirmation of policy to be followed. Perhaps such legislative action is not necessary if we guard our tongues and our actions with respect to programs already adopted. It has been said that we talk too much; and in times like these loose talk is indeed a danger to all of us.

It seems pertinent to observe that already there have been discussions of our foreign policy. In my view, strained constructions have been placed on certain public utterances. A careful analysis shows that most of these statements have emphasized disagreement with methods rather than with basic policy, and even such disagreement appears to be a matter of degree. It seems to me that a careful consideration of the President's message and of what has been said in this Chamber by responsible people must give all of us a sense of hopefulness for the future. It fortifies the belief that there are no great differences among the majority of us as to our overall policy.

Our Government has made clear that it expects and hopes for a particular degree of cooperation from the western European nations. Our Government has, in fact, proposed that these nations give prompt and clear proof that they are going to raise a minimum number of troops, arm themselves, with our help, and give unmistakable evidence of a will to resist Soviet Russian threats of aggression. We have said that if this is done promptly, effectively, and sincerely we stand ready to send a limited number of American divisions to aid in the defense of those countries.

Mr. President, some have suggested that the time has come for a major debate on American foreign policy. While I have no objection to such a debate, and in fact I would welcome it if it were conducted on a high plane, I am constrained to observe that we must be cautious and prudent in what is said. The interests of our country and the peace of the world will be better served if we weigh our words carefully. I say that, simply because one of this Nation's most trusted and competent citizens, a man whose judgment and ability all of us respect and value, is now in Europe to gather certain pertinent facts which are essential to the carrying on of an intelligent debate on American foreign policy.

General Eisenhower has gone to Europe to learn the facts, to make the evaluation. He is expected to return to this country some time next month with those facts. Is it wise for us to make statements here which would make his great task more difficult? Is it prudent to prejudge the facts he will assemble? Is it sensible to proclaim judgments and assert positions which we may find untenable or improvident later?

All of us know that his report will be complete, honest, and forthright. All of us know that he will call a spade a spade; that there will be no varnish, no double meanings, no evasions in what he tells us. It may be that his report will make meaningless much of what some of us would say now. In any event, it seems to me that prudence and plain common sense would dictate that we ought to know more and, meanwhile, talk less.

I want to emphasize as strongly as I can that I am not suggesting for one moment an end to debate, or even to controversy, on many matters which will come before us in the days ahead. There will be ample opportunity for us to differ, perhaps even sharply. That is a part of our process of government, and I, for one, shall welcome it as a sign that our democracy is healthy. But it must be observed that those differences will be noted and magnified, even distorted; and that such distortion may well be to the grave disadvantage of our country and our people. I should like to suggest that, once a policy is adopted, voted upon and set into motion, we accept the democratic principle of majority rule and stand united and firm for that policy; that all of us stop petty bickering and name-calling and face up shoulder to shoulder to the great task before us.

For it is a great task, Mr. President, the greatest task that free men and women have ever had to face. What kind of people do our adversaries think we are? Is there any doubt that we can and will overcome them? Is there a faint heart among us? What have we to fear? Industrially we are the strongest nation the world has ever seen. When it comes to the waging of modern war—war that involves machines and electronics and the atom—we can have no equal. If the need requires, we can deal death, destruction, and desolation, measure for measure, and with interest compounded. We are a people made up of the great qualities of all the nations of earth; a sturdy, resolute people who know the benefits of liberty. We have proved time and again that we will shed our blood and spend our substance for that which we believe right. We will do it again and without limit, if need be. The place to demonstrate that we mean this is here in the greatest free legislative assembly in the world; the place where the people's representatives are supreme; the place where, in the final analysis, policy is made.

Mr. President, call these poor words of mine a plea for cooperation or what you will. I am asking frankly that my colleagues in this Chamber remember that there are no aisles separating Republicans and Democrats in the ships at sea, in the aircraft aloft, in the marching regiments; I am asking that my colleagues stand together, unite, make clear by their every action and their every word that all of us have a single overriding objective—the good of the Nation and the peace of the world. Once we have achieved that unity of thought, of purpose, and of action, it will resound throughout the world with such force that many of the problems which now seem unsurmountable will solve themselves.

NECESSITY TO MEET FAIRLY AND SQUARELY THE ISSUES FACING THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, this is a solemn and serious hour when we are to consult each other regarding the paramount interests and security of the people of the United States.

Nearly 175 years ago our forefathers dissolved the political bands that bound the Colonies to England. They did so because their inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness were in danger.

As the Eighty-second Congress debates the President's state of the Union message, every American expects to preserve for our Nation, with his life if necessary, those same inalienable rights. Indeed, I am sure we are all agreed that the prime objective of American policy is to maintain the liberty and the security of our people.

We are today engaged in a notable debate. The debate is not on the ends of our foreign policy, but on the means to the end. We bring to this debate a great tradition. That is the tradition of the free exchange of ideas that has taken place on the floor of the Senate since our Government was founded. Our debates here reflect and distill the thinking of our rulers—the American people. Out of this debate will come new ideas, new conclusions, and, I hope, a new unity.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] suggested last week that appeals for unity from administration sources may be attempts to cover past faults and failures. That is not the case. The unity I ask for is the unity that comes in a democracy as the result of our confidence in the ability of the American people to hear all sides of issues, to determine the merits of the proposals, and then to pull together toward our common goal.

I hope sincerely that we will not spend our time here fighting the battles of the past. There have been times when consultation between the administration and the Congress has been forgotten. There have been times when the American people have not had sufficient information to enable them to pass judgment on the issues before our Government. I think there have also been times when opponents of administration policy have not been willing to discuss issues on their merits, or have cultivated issues for their own purposes. But let us look ahead to the tremendous problems we face.

Thomas Jefferson once remarked that "error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." In these halls we will hear error of opinion, but reason is free. What I ask now is that we meet fairly and squarely the issues that face the United States. Our discussions here can help the people of this great Nation to know and understand the tremendous responsibilities our size and strength and freedom impose upon us.

PRINCIPLES UNDERLYING UNITED STATES POLICY SINCE WORLD WAR II

During the past 5 years, certain basic themes and principles of American foreign policy have emerged on which the programs that express our policy have been built. I review them now because they need frequent restatement so that in the pressure of this crisis we will not lose sight of them.

I want to emphasize in the first place, as strongly as I can, that the primary objective of this Government has always been the security of the United States. Closely linked to this fundamental is our continuing effort to contribute to the world framework for a just and lasting peace. As one means to these ends, we have given, and will continue to give, unflagging support to the United Nations. That is, and must remain, a cornerstone of our international policy.

While the United Nations must remain the cornerstone of our policy, I do believe that its members must take careful and solemn note of the growing concern of the American people that the United Nations is not fulfilling its great promise. I say in all sincerity to each and every Member of the United Nations that if the international community is not willing now as a matter of principle to recognize aggression for what it is, whenever and wherever it occurs, then the United Nations will die as surely as the tree without a tap root.

Mr. President, I say these things because the primary purpose of the organization of the United Nations was to resist aggression and to settle international disputes by peaceful means.

It was aggression in June when the North Korean Communists attacked the Republic of Korea. It is aggression today when Chinese Communists attack our UN forces. If the United Nations wants to retain the confidence and support of our people, it must not run to cover when the going becomes a little rough.

It has been said that "peoples and governments never have learned anything from history, or acted on principles deduced from it." The League of Nations failed because the great powers, despite the constant urging and pleadings of the small states, would not back up the League. The United States learned that lesson. But now, strange as it seems, we are confronted by the uncertainty and unwillingness of the smaller powers to accept the fundamental principle of the Charter that the United Nations will take effective collective measures to suppress aggression. That means aggression by great powers as well as by small powers.

Our determined adherence to the United Nations demonstrates our flat rejection of the thesis that war is inevitable. We believe that war can be avoided and that the differences between the free world and the Soviet Union which are at the root of every current major problem can be resolved by negotiation and agreement.

But we know now that war can be avoided only if the free nations have the economic and military strength to guarantee such rough handling of acts of aggression that the Communist imperialists will abandon aggression as a tactic. This economic and military power will also enable the free world to make certain that the Soviet Union will live up to its agreements both in letter and in spirit.

This principle has been described as the building of situations of strength. It has been put to the test at various points during the past 5 years, and in each instance where we have led from strength we have always been able to resolve the issue in our favor—whether in Berlin, in connection with the airlift, or Italy, or Greece, or Western Europe. The political, economic, and military programs which have been developed since the end of World War II have all been keyed to the creation of the necessary strength in areas that are threatened by Soviet imperialism.

I believe that the reception given these measures in the Senate—evidenced by votes of approval which, without exception, were overwhelming—is proof of wide support for them on the Senate floor, and that in each instance the measures were a clear expression of the popular will.

The major components of this policy were seven. The first was the United Nations Charter, which was approved in the Senate by a vote of 89 to 2, evidencing the hunger of the American people for some civil agency established to preserve the peace of the world and to settle international quarrels by peaceful means. The treaty of Rio de Janeiro was ratified by 72 to 1, Greek-Turkish aid was passed by 67 to 23, and the Vandenberg resolution was adopted by 64 to 4. The European recovery program, as to which we have had some complaint in recent times because of the foreign policy that is involved, received 69 ayes and 17 nays. The North Atlantic Treaty, which has been attacked in recent times, was ratified by a vote of 82 to 13. On the mutual defense assistance program the vote was 55 to 24. One year later, shortly after the invasion of Korea, the program was extended by a unanimous vote of 66 to 0.

Is that not evidence by the elected representatives of the people of a firm determination to carry forward and to enact measures which embody the foreign policy of the United States of America?

Step by step, these basic elements of our foreign policy have been considered by the Senate. Their conception has been adjudged sound and their objective consistent with the best interests of the United States.

Mr. President, this is an amazing voting record. It indicates a spirit of unity and determination that should be heartening to freemen everywhere.

THE ISSUES WE MUST DEBATE

I have already commented on our great tradition of debate in this body. I stand for the freedom of debate. That freedom is greater even than the freedom of the press and many of the other freedoms we enjoy. It is free so that the people of the United States may know the issues and may know the attitude of their representatives on the floor of the Senate.

Last Friday the senior Senator from Ohio set forth his views on the foreign policy of the United States. He discussed a number of issues that go to the heart of our foreign policy. His statement has attracted considerable attention in the United States and in foreign countries, some friendly, some unfriendly. As a consequence of this debate I expect there will be reactions that many of us do not expect.

My information regarding the impact of the speech upon the people of Western Europe is that many of them have been stunned in view of the North Atlantic Pact, our signature to the pact, and the suggested repudiation of the pact. I recall vividly, and I know many other Senators will also recall, the ceremony which was held on the occasion of the signing of the North Atlantic Pact. The high representatives of the nations who were parties to the agreement appeared and with appropriate ceremony affixed their signatures to the great document in behalf of the peace and security of the North Atlantic area. No wonder they are stunned, and no wonder many of them feel despair, unless they know that we will remain true to our obligations and to our pledged faith.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I prefer not to yield at this time. However, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I only wish to ask the Senator from Texas whether he claims that I advocated any repudiation whatever of the North Atlantic Pact. He is implying that I did. I want to know whether he claims I did, and, if so, in what way he so claims.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not charge the Senator from Ohio with repudiating the pact.

Mr. TAFT. I thank the Senator from Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, yes.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator states an untruth, because the Senator stated that my speech stunned the people of Western Europe because it involved a repudiation of the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. CONNALLY. I said my information was to that effect. I said my information was that the people were stunned.

Mr. TAFT. By my speech, according to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not say that. I will repeat what I said, if the Senator from Ohio has any doubt about it. My information regarding the impact of the speech upon the people of Western Europe is that many of them have been stunned. Does the Senator deny it?

Mr. TAFT. The speech to which the Senator has referred has already been identified as my speech.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator deny that the speech has stunned many people in Europe?

Mr. TAFT. The Senator implies that the people in Western Europe are stunned because what I said involved a repudiation of the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not say that.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator certainly did say it. I leave it to the RECORD to show what he said.

Mr. CONNALLY. I said they did not want to believe that we had repudiated the North Atlantic Pact.

I did not say anything about the Senator from Ohio. I said the people of Europe did not want to believe it, and that they were stunned at the thought that we might repudiate our pledged word. I will emphasize what I said.

Once again the specter of doubt has been raised as to our determination to live up to our international commitments. It has given rare and tragic credence to Soviet propaganda that America is sharply divided on the degree of leadership it will assume in this world crisis, that we are faltering when the chips are down, and that after all the best policy for Europe to follow is neutrality.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield briefly for a question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. With reference to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, in view of the fact that he voted against the North Atlantic Pact, and because of many statements contained in his speech of last week, I do not think it is at all unreasonable for people to believe that he has a very restricted view of the application of the North Atlantic Pact, and that if interpreted along legalistic lines it could be made ineffective. It would certainly explain why people were disappointed in his speech. It certainly could be interpreted in that way.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

I desire to take this occasion to say to our friends in Europe that they must seek to understand the United States. We believe that the destiny of our country is best guided by the people of our country. In the debate that is now underway all points of view will be expressed. Our friends abroad will hear many things they do not like. They will hear many things they do like. I am sure that they will find that the American people will be ready in the future, as they have in the past, to stand with their full strength on the side of the freedom, the tradition, and the culture that is European in origin and ours by adoption.

Let me first speak for a moment about the subject of attaining security for the United States and some of the questionable conclusions which have been advanced from several quarters in recent days.

The charge has been made that the President has violated the Constitution of the United States by sending troops to Korea. The President's power to send additional troops to Europe has also been challenged. The scope of the authority of the President as Commander in Chief to send the Armed Forces to any place required by the security interests of the United States has often been questioned, but never denied by authoritative opinion.

Mr. President, the Constitution provides that the President of the United States shall be Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. When was the Constitution adopted? It was adopted, of course, after the Revolutionary War and after the experience of the States under the Confederation. Why was it provided that the President should be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy? The founding fathers still had vividly in their recollection the mistakes and troubles of the Continental Congress in trying to conduct the military affairs of the United States. They remembered that General Washington had to overcome many difficulties by reason of the activities of certain Members of the Continental Congress. Under the Confederation the same troubles existed. So the Constitution provided that the President should be Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. If our forefathers had wanted Congress to be the Commander in Chief, they would have said so. But they did not. They said that the President of the United States should be Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. That principle has never been seriously questioned as a legal proposition. It follows, furthermore, that with such power the President of the United States has the authority to send the Armed Forces to any part of the world if the security and safety of the United States are involved.

Former President, and later Chief Justice Taft expressed the view that the President had the authority to send the Armed Forces to any place where, in his judgment, their presence would contribute to American security. On more than 100 occasions our troops have been sent abroad on the authority of the President including such cases as the dispatch of marines to Nicaragua and other Central or South American states, and troops to help suppress the Boxer Rebellion in China. As for the future, I am confident that the executive branch will consult with Congress on troop commitments to the integrated European defense force now being mobilized. Indeed it is my understanding that administration leaders are not hostile to such an idea.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator for yielding. I ask this question in the light of his last observation. Does the Senator understand that no commitment has been made by the President to furnish foot soldiers for an integrated army in Europe, and that if and when such commitment is made, it will be brought to the Congress for consideration?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think the Senator ought to ask that question, because that is a highly executive question. I really do not know, but I assume that there is some feeling that a commitment of that kind will be made, or we would not have General Eisenhower in Europe now.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the point I wanted to make. I am asking this question in the best of faith, because I think this is the crux of the whole debate.

Mr. CONNALLY. What I have said is simply my view. I am confident that the executive branch will consult with Congress on our commitments with respect to the integrated European defense forces now being mobilized.

Mr. WHERRY. I think that is a very reassuring statement. I ask the question because certainly under the North Atlantic defense treaty the Congress determines the character of the aid to be given, and certainly Congress will carry out the policy. The reason I ask the question is that there have been headlines in the newspapers—I do not say that they are true—wherein the Senator is quoted to the effect that he feels that the Congress should determine whether or not land forces should be committed. I hope that is the Senator's interpretation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not say that.

Mr. WHERRY. I was trying to give the Senator from Texas credit for saying it. If he did not say it, very well. But the point I am trying to bring to his attention is that if that is the policy now, the American people should know it. The Senator is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. If the administration is to submit to Congress the question of determining the character of the aid, then I believe that that is fully in keeping with the treaty. The Congress will then determine the policy. If it is the sentiment of the Congress that land soldiers should be committed, very well. I simply asked the Senator whether he knew of any commitments which had been made for foot soldiers to become a part of the integrated army in Western Europe.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have answered the Senator. I am not going to agree with him.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator from Texas often disagrees with me. I am not asking the Senator to agree with me. I am asking a simple, fair question. The Senator from Texas is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope I am.

Mr. WHERRY. We all treat him with great respect because he is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He is the mouthpiece, the spokesman, of the administration on foreign policy, and I treat the Senator with great respect. All I am asking is a simple question in which I think every American is interested. Has the President committed us to the furnishing of foot soldiers in Europe? That is all I am asking.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is a little beyond the scope of these remarks.

Mr. WHERRY. If the Senator declines to answer, very well. I do not wish to ask for any information which is secret. If such information is secret, I withdraw the question. However, the subject has been discussed in the newspapers. It has been said that we have committed five divisions, six divisions, or some other number of divisions. All I am asking, as an American citizen, is this: Does the Senator know whether any commitment has been made? I was about to congratulate the Senator on the statement which he made, which was most reassuring, that before any commitment was made the question would be submitted to the Congress, and the Congress would determine the policy, as to whether we are to commit foot soldiers to an integrated army in Europe.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator stretches what I said. I stated that I felt that the Congress would be advised.

Mr. WHERRY. I hope so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not say that it would be.

Let me say to the Senator that I do not agree with him in the idea that the Congress must say exactly how many foot soldiers shall be sent to Europe, just how many airplanes shall be sent there, and just how many battleships shall be sent. I do not agree with that view. That is a military question which must be decided under the guidance of the President of the United States and his military advisers.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield. I hope the Senator will not interrupt too much.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not wish to heckle the Senator. I do not wish to put on a shadow dance or hula dance. All I want to do is to find out from the Senator the answer to one simple question. Have foot soldiers been committed? If they have not been committed, will the administration let the Congress determine the policy? That is a very simple question, but every American wants to know the answer.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator knows it——

Mr. WHERRY. I do not know it. I am trying to find out.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator knows it, it will not take long for the American people to know it.

Mr. WHERRY. I will do my level best, when I get the information, to let them know.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will remain quiet for a moment, I shall answer the question further.

Mr. WHERRY. I shall keep quiet.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have already answered the question. I have told the Senator that I do not know. I stated that at the outset. But I assume that before any considerable number of troops are sent to Europe the Congress will be advised about it.

The Senator from Nebraska talks about the Foreign Relations Committee. I am a member of that committee. I wish to say to the Senator that there has never been any attempt in that committee to shut off debate or to keep information from any member of the committee, whether he be a Democrat or Republican.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not charging anything of the kind. I have never said anything about shutting off debate. I appreciate the Senator's statement that he wants debate. That is what we are giving him.

I think the American people have the right to an answer to these questions. To me they represent the crux of the entire debate. I hope the debate will center around the questions which I have raised. I say that in all sincerity and with deep respect and affection for the Senator from Texas. The question which I ask is vital. It is a question of policy. All I want to know is whether the Congress will have the right to determine the policy before commitments are made.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have answered the Senator three or four times. The reason I urge him not to interrupt me so much is that other Senators desire to follow me.

Mr. WHERRY. I am sorry. I will not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am trying to accommodate them. They are Republicans, too.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well. I shall not interrupt.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be very glad to hear them speak. Regardless of what party a Senator belongs to, I am glad to hear him speak on the subject.

Mr. WHERRY. I know that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say that during my tenure as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate I have never raised a partisan question at any time on any bill before the Foreign Relations Committee. Every member of that committee who has served on it for any considerable period of time will confirm what I have just said. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupants of the galleries will refrain from any demonstrations.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more observation?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I will say to the Senator that I am not raising any partisan issue.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know the Senator from Nebraska is not. As I have stated, several other Republicans want to speak, and I want them to speak. I want to hear them. The Senator from Nebraska, as minority leader, can get into the debate whenever he wants to.

Reference has been made in recent months to what is described as the administration's resort to the practice of secret negotiation and secret agreements. The Senator from Ohio referred, as an example, to the Marshall plan. I wonder if the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] would agree with him. I am grieved that our distinguished colleague from Michigan has been ill for so long. I pray God that he may speedily recover, and may soon return to the floor of the Senate to lead many of his misguided followers back into the paths of rectitude and knowledge.

I recall clearly the developments which led up to the adoption of the European recovery program during the Republican Eightieth Congress. All Senators remember the speech delivered by Secretary Marshall at Harvard, where he first broke the news as to the plan respecting ERP. The extensive and exhaustive airing given all aspects of the program has no equal in the history of this country. For months prior to the passage of the ERP Act the newspapers, the radios, and the public forums of the Nation devoted millions of words to the discussion of the program. Both Houses of the Congress sent unofficial quorums to Europe during the summer of 1947. The word "quorums" is not perhaps exactly accurate, but what I meant was that large groups from both the House and the Senate went to Europe during the summer of 1947. Lengthy hearings were held on the proposal and after the conclusion of the hearings there was full and open debate on the floor.

Allegations of this nature tend to obstruct the intelligent and constructive debate that is needed in this situation. And I repeat, such debate is necessary if we are to arrive at an international policy which will command the full confidence of the people and draw the essential support of the leadership of both parties. It is up to the Members of the Senate to make sure that debate is kept strictly within the limits of fact and reality.

Let us turn now to certain assumptions which have been made and which could lead this Nation into tragic error if they were widely accepted.

It has been said that there is no conclusive evidence that the Soviets expect to start a war with the United States. That is a dangerous delusion. Millions of people the world over signed the Stockholm peace petition, and then the Communists launched their attack in Korea. The distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], while serving as United States representative to the General Assembly of the United Nations, offered a quotation from Soviet Foreign Minister Vishinsky which is highly pertinent and which could properly be considered as evidence on this point. Mr. Vishinsky was distinguishing between the Communist version of "just" and "unjust" wars. He said:

> Lenin said that just wars are those which are designed to liberate people from capitalistic slavery. * * * According to Lenin a just war is not an aggressive war but a liberating war which is designed either to defend people from foreign attack and from attempts to enslave it, or the liberation of people from capitalistic slavery, or else the liberation of colonies and dependent countries from the yoke of imperialists.

From all I have heard, I believe America meets the Soviet definition of a capitalist country.

There is another bit of evidence which ought also to be considered. There is no doubt in any Senator's mind that the Chinese Communists, who are currently attacking the United Nations Army in Korea, receive not only encouragement but extensive military aid and equipment from the Soviet Union. This equipment from the Soviet is being used to kill boys from many United Nations.

This is conclusive evidence to me that the Soviet masters are ready to have their people or their puppets shoot American troops, or UN troops, or any other free people who stand in their way. We are strongly of the opinion that when one person shoots at another, he is being unfriendly. The same reasoning leads me to regard Moscow's present policy as hostile. If we must take time arguing over the extent and the precise expression of that hostility, we are quibbling over words.

There were among us in 1941 some who scoffed at the possibility that any nation would dare attack the United States. This attitude did not prevent the dastardly attack on Pearl Harbor. No American wants a war. But let us beware that we do not let our desires color our view of the realities of the day.

Some of my colleagues have opposed, in principle at least, the sending of additional American troops to Europe on the ground that the Soviet will regard the construction of an effective defense for Europe as preparation for aggression. They fear that the Soviet may attack before the defenses reach effective size and would overrun the Continent—destroying such forces as we have sent there. Why should we "feather the bed for Stalin," cry the critics.

It is clear that without steps of a defensive nature, the Soviet Union has the military strength—as it has had for the past 5 years—to overrun Europe any time it desires. Consequently, proponents of this view must believe that Europe is lost, and that nothing can be done to defend it. Or perhaps that is not a fair construction to put on this argument. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that those who advance this idea believe that an attempt to strengthen Europe will invite attack. The logical extension of that premise is that it is safer to leave Europe weak. So we arrive at the curious conclusion that if we want to avoid attack, we should make no preparation for it. It is a sort of strength-through-weakness philosophy.

The Senator from Ohio recommended last week that we aid in European defense with a naval and air force of Gargantuan power. We could, he believes, protect Europe as it has been protected now for 5 years through fear of what sea and air power can accomplish against Russia. Such a view is based on the presumption that the Soviet Government would not react to the establishment of such a force, although it would react to strengthening the ground forces of the European countries. Mr. President, I do not understand this line of reasoning. The leaders of the Soviet are not fools. If they are going to launch an assault because we try to build what is obviously a defensive force in Europe, then why would they not also strike back if we mount a sea and air force which is a serious threat to them?

There is a second factor involved. A combined sea and air force, such as ex-President Hoover and others have proposed, would commit us to weapons that have, so far, shown themselves incapable of executing the mission which they would assign to them. I do not profess to be an expert on the military actualities and potentialities of air power. However, I have been informed that the action in Korea has been conducted under circumstances highly favorable to the optimum use of aircraft. The distance from base to target is relatively short, and we enjoy absolute air supremacy. Despite these highly advantageous conditions and a vigorous and skillfully pressed air strategy, air power was unable to halt the North Korean offensive, and it has been unable to stop the onrush of the Chinese Reds.

This comment is in no way intended to detract from the magnificent job our flyers have done in Korea. They have scored heavily there. But this experience does raise grave doubts that an air force is capable of stopping the westward advance of a huge, well-equipped Soviet force.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at this point?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; very briefly.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not fair to say, in defense of the Air Force and its work in Korea, that it has been handicapped by very uncertain, foggy, rainy, icy weather; and also, insofar as helping the Ground Forces is concerned, that the Air Force has been very much handicapped by the mountainous country?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So it would not be a fair statement to say that the Air Force has fallen down in Korea.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Even though our Air Force had no opposition from hostile forces, it is operating there under the most difficult and most severe conditions which could be found in almost any part of the world. Is not that true?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct. I was not criticizing the Air Force. I think it has done a magnificent job in Korea. However, I was pointing out that an air force alone cannot stop an overwhelming mass of foot soldiers as they sweep in. An air force can kill or disable many of them; but what are left will sweep on. So, according to my view, air power alone would not be sufficient.

There are those who suggest that an attempt to construct effective defenses for the North Atlantic community is certain to fail because the Soviets would strike before the job was half done. Therefore, they oppose the sending of our ground units to participate in that defense. But, Mr. President, if this reasoning is correct, why do not these same people urge the withdrawal of our troops from Germany? Surely no greater provocation, according to this faint-heart philosophy, could exist than United States troops so close to the iron curtain. Realizing that such a view is untenable, the senior Senator from Ohio has declared that when the nations of Western Europe see the need of, and demand, a coordinated defense, and if it appears that the defense has a reasonable chance of success, he would not object to the commitment of a limited number of American divisions to work with them in the general spirit of the Atlantic Pact.

But where does that leave us? Do the proponents of this point of view expect that our allies will see the need for and demand something that they know is bound to fail? Are they willing to spend even a limited number of American divisions to partake of the disaster they fear? Peace cannot come so long as there remains a critical unbalance of military power between the Communist and non-Communist worlds. We must move with speed and determination to strengthen our own forces and those of our allies. Only thus can we adjust the unbalance which exists and erase any temptation on the part of the Soviet Union to launch an aggressive war.

In considering the question of a European defense, we must not gloss over the Franco-German dilemma. It has taken our representatives nearly 2 years of painstaking labor to lay the foundations for the resolution of this century-old problem and to reach a point where they are in sight of a working accord between these two major nations of Western Europe. The compromises that France has made, which go counter to all her bitter experience with her neighbor to the east, rely for the most part on assurance from the United States that the Prussians will not be again permitted to gain military dominance in Europe.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point for another question?

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well; I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Is not there one more underlying factor which the Senator has not fully stated—although perhaps he will do so later in his speech—namely, that we must take the initiative for our own defense? Can we assume that we can defend ourselves if Europe falls?

I disagree with the premise of the Senator from Ohio, as set forth in his speech in the Senate the other day, when he said that the Europeans must take the initiative for building up the armies in Europe. I believe they must supply most of the men, a great proportion of them; but it seems to me that we also have a responsibility, in safeguarding our own defense, to provide some of the initiative, perhaps the stimulating initiative. Is not that another point which the Senator from Texas believes is important in connection with the subject he is now discussing?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for the interruption and for his question.

All along, the United States has been the leader in the idea of the Atlantic Pact; that is the reason why General Eisenhower is now in Europe, where he is trying to rally the nations of Western Europe to carry out the program we have in mind.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is not that a part of the initiative which is definitely connected with the defense of the United States and with the maintenance of the security and safety of our own people?

Mr. CONNALLY. I expect to discuss that point a little later. However, if I do not, I shall say now that I regard our safety as being dependent upon the safety of Western Europe; and if Western Europe can be made safe, we shall be made safe.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The question which has bothered me, and to which I have not been able to obtain an answer—perhaps the Senator from Texas can answer it—is this: If the Russians are able to conquer Europe today, why should they wait for us to complete, after 3 years, an international army? Why will not the Russians attack the moment it becomes a threat to them? Assuming, as the Senator says, that they intend to be a threat to the rest of the world, why will they wait until we are able to stand up against them?

Mr. CONNALLY. One reason may be that they may not be ready for war. Another reason may be that they fear the atomic bomb, and fear that we could make greater use of it than they could.

I am not in contact with the Russians; I cannot state their reasons. However, I have simply stated my reaction.

Mr. TAFT. Would not it be obvious to them that we would double and quadruple our production of atomic bombs, and would produce many more of them than they would, and that, therefore, in regard to the production of atomic bombs, we would have a constantly increasing superiority, rather than a falling off?

Mr. CONNALLY. Much guesswork is involved in that assumption. We are producing atomic bombs, but we do not know the rate of the production of such bombs by the Russians. At one time we did not think the Russians had the atomic bomb, but we found out that they did.

There are among us many who approve the idea of internationalism if the price is right. They will accept internationalism if it can be bought at the bargain counter.

Mr. President, this is one of the supreme fallacies of our time. You simply cannot put a price tag on world peace. The price of peace, like the price of liberty, is eternal vigilance, coupled with a readiness to make whatever sacrifices are necessary, to pay whatever the price may be.

Of course, it would be splendid if we did not have to support a large ground army. It would be encouraging if we found it unnecessary to spend huge sums on our defense program or to impose controls upon our domestic economy. It would be comforting if we could act as if there were no real threat to our national security. But that kind of reasoning is not in conformity with the brutal facts of international life which we confront.

Mr. President, I bow to no man in the strength of my feeling that America must maintain its economic power and that we must take fast and decisive action to check inflationary trends before they have a chance to gain impetus. However, I refuse to place a price tag on the security of the United States. I am not a devotee of the school that believes in keeping and strengthening our allies—only if it does not cost too much. I do not believe in shopping for security at the bargain counter.

A POSITIVE POLICY

Mr. President, the underlying fallacy of the suggestions I have been considering derives from the failure to assign appropriate weight to the actual components that make up American security.

There are three major factors which have been dominant in keeping the uneasy peace which has prevailed since the Japanese surrendered. They are the three main elements which have deterred the Soviet Union from all-out aggression. The existence of the first has given us an interval of time that is all too brief to develop the second and the third.

The first great deterrent, of course, is American supremacy in atomic weapons. Beyond doubt, our possession of a quantity of atomic bombs combined with the operation of bombers capable of delivering them has held the Soviet in check. This deterrent will be effective until such time as the Soviet is able to build up a stockpile of bombs sufficient to challenge American superiority.

The second great deterrent is the tremendous productive capacity represented by the combination of our own industrial might plus that of Western Europe and the Ruhr.

The third is the fact that in this struggle for survival the vast majority of the nations of the world stand with us against the forces of evil and tyranny.

Some people lose sight of the fact, for example, that Western Europe is the second greatest industrial complex in the world, second only to the United States. If the capacity and the technical skills of the workers of the area were allowed by super caution on our part, or timidity as regards our commitments, to fall into Soviet hands, we would have suffered a decisive loss. One of the great points of our strength is our industrial power. But if the Soviet should conquer Western Europe and take over all its manufacturing, it would be a very serious blow. With the Ruhr and the factories of Western Europe under Russian control, the primacy of the United States would be seriously challenged. Industry under Soviet control would then exceed that available to us by an uncomfortable margin. They would add enormously to their technical resources and to the raw materials available to them. Correspondingly, this country would find itself cut off from many strategic materials required by our production. For example, it is well known that our main source of uranium comes from an area under the control of a country of Western Europe.

I could go into this phase of our interest in Europe in far greater detail if time permitted. But I feel that what I have said is sufficient to document my point that we need Western Europe as much as Western Europe needs us. The security of the United States is inseparably coupled with that of our allies in the North Atlantic community. Consequently, we cannot seriously entertain a policy of limited, half-hearted participation in the defense of that area, even though it has the appeal of being economical. It would be a cosmic example of being penny-wise and pound-foolish.

Mr. John Foster Dulles recently observed that—

> Any nation which at a moment of supreme danger sheds those of its allies who are most endangered, and to whom it is bound by solemn treaty, is scarcely in a position thereafter to do much picking and choosing for its own account. It elects a dangerous course, for solitary defense is never impregnable. It is possible to plan, on paper, and describe in words, what it seems should be an impregnable defense, a China Wall, a Maginot line, a Rock of Gibraltar, an Atlantic and Pacific moat. But the mood that plans such a defense carries within itself the seeds of its own collapse. A defense that accepts encirclement quickly decomposes. That has been proved a thousand times.

We must have allies to realize our full potential of strength. At the moment, both our strength and that of Western Europe is only partly realized, partially organized. The atom bomb has given us time to work with our friends there, to help them achieve their full strength. As I have pointed out, the probable interval of time allotted to us for this task has been alarmingly shortened. But, if we buckle down to the job, and if they buckle down to the job, it can still be done.

Let me emphasize that self-help and mutual aid have always been the basis of the whole North Atlantic defense effort. This will continue to be the condition of our participation in the build-up of the pact nations. They have already made extreme sacrifices, and they have promised to do more. The French Parliament recently passed a military budget double that of last year—and we should never forget that France has maintained a force of 150,000 of her front-line troops in Indochina. For France, this has been an extraordinarily costly operation. Her losses of officers exceed the number graduated in the same period from the French West Point.

Britain, too, has been fighting Communist guerrillas in Malaya for more than a year. These actions have placed an additional burden on economies already severely strained.

What has been done thus far under the pact organization can be taken as a concrete manifestation of the serious intent of our European partners. Although they have accomplished considerable, we do not think it enough. We will require more. I must remind you, however, that the additional effort put forth will, in large measure, be conditioned by our action.

We may be unable to see why the peoples of the continent doubt that we are serious. But, remember, we do not live in the shadow of the iron curtain. We have not suffered invasion twice in a generation. Our homes are not within a few days' march of a hundred Russian divisions. Their exposed situation makes them cautious. It is understandable that they should be extremely sensitive to signs that might be interpreted as weakened American intent.

Thus, in practical terms the initiative rests with us. It has been said that an increase in the American forces in Europe would put a sudden end to these hesitations and fears. The indications are that this statement is well-founded in fact.

The boost in morale and popular spirit resulting from a troop commitment of that nature would probably be more than sufficient to support the parallel effort which we should demand from them in return. That, in practical terms, is probably the manner in which the effective defense that we are determined to build will be fashioned. It will be a joint effort; and the point on which we and our partners must make up our minds is that nothing short of an all-out effort will do. That is the minimum.

There is no time to waste. The appointment of General Eisenhower is a long step forward. If any commander can achieve the maximum possible participation in the shortest possible time, he is that man. His appearance in Europe has had an electrifying effect.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield for a question.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator has confined his argument in this paragraph of his statement to manpower on land, ground troops. He intends to say, does he not, that it is equally as important that the United States shall increase and improve its air power and sea power?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, yes. The reason I paid attention to manpower was because there was so much stress on that subject by the opposition.

The United States today bears a tremendous responsibility. I believe that never before has one nation had the destiny of mankind so within its control. True, we say that the Soviet Union can decide whether there will be war or peace in our time. But it is the United States that can decide whether life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, or death, tyranny, and misery are to be the fate of mankind.

This responsibility is upon the people of the United States and upon us, their elected representatives.

We have a great people, a people peculiarly adapted to leadership of the free world. We draw our heritage from more races and creeds than any other nation on earth. We have banded ourselves together in a union based on the dignity of the individual. Our people have created a productive system that is stronger and more efficient and better for the common man than is any other on earth. We have created a government able to express the will of the people and incorporate that will in our national policy.

My friends in the United States Senate, we have at this time a high duty to do all we can to thrash out the divergent points of view of our people and help them determine the path we are to follow in the years ahead. The responsibilities we have discharged in the past few years, the unanimity we have been able to achieve in program after program, speak well for our system.

Democrats and Republicans on the Foreign Relations Committee have always exercised their right, and, indeed, viewed it as their duty to examine administration proposals, test them against the public mandate, criticize, and amend. We have exercised our judgment on behalf of the American people, trying at all times to reflect their will. Our record of bipartisan unanimity on all matters of major importance since the war is one of which I am extremely proud.

We bear a heavy responsibility today in the United States Senate. What we say here, what we do here, can give the people of the world hope, or turn them away in despair from the citadel of freedom.

While this is a terrible responsibility which our country bears, it is also a rare opportunity.

The President of the United States asked that we stand together as Americans and that we stand together with all men everywhere who believe in human liberty. We will do no less. We can do no more. Let the unfair critics sheathe their swords. Let us not employ our weapons against each other. Let us face the enemy together in defense of our security and our liberty.

With the unity of purpose that comes from the justice of our cause, and with firm belief in the divine guidance that has made our country great, we face the future with courage and determination.

SUGGESTIONS AS TO THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall take approximately half an hour, at the end of which time I shall welcome questions, but I should like to make this statement without interruptions.

There is no doubt whatever that throughout our history free debate has added greatly to the strength of our national decisions. It is one of the greatest services rendered by an institution such as the Senate. If all we had now to consider was American opinion, we could unhesitatingly say that the freest debate on foreign policy would without any doubt be good.

But we cannot build a wall around the United States and confine this discussion solely to the ears and eyes of the American people. What we say here is heard and read—and misinterpreted—all over the world—and the reaction of the world closely affects American welfare. While there is undoubtedly a legitimate area for public discussion, we help our enemies if we here discuss details of strategy and tactics, talking about the places we will hold or abandon. Such discussion will lose us the support of peoples who otherwise think we might some day be able to help them. Senators have recently calmly discussed what places we might have to bomb—places whose inhabitants we still hope might someday have a common cause with us. This does not make friends for us abroad, however much it may reassure people at home. If we do not discuss these matters our debate may lack realism and may not give reassurance, but at least it will not mean the loss of potential partners should a future conflict occur. Let us never forget that up to June 1949 our two divisions in Korea, which were 6,000 miles from home, close to the Soviet border, and overwhelmingly outnumbered, had been unmolested either by the Soviets or their satellites. Then we withdrew the troops and announcement was made that the United States defense line ran from the Aleutians through Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines, and that the area bounded by the thirty-eighth parallel was not essential to our defense. We know what happened after that. Let us not make another error of this type insofar as other parts of the world are concerned.

It is good that to date this debate has been conducted without personalities. May it so continue, and may there be no political motivation in anything that is said. These few remarks are not a rebuttal to or a defense of any individual. It is hard for me to side consistently with any individual or party as regards foreign policy. I honor and respect the motives and objectives of the Senators who may differ with me. Insofar as this particular administration is concerned, I have held consistently that its lack of foresight and its tragic miscalculations clearly deserve censure; its belated efforts to meet the challenge of communism deserve support; and its present efforts toward building military strength should be both bigger and faster. That is my stand.

The aim of foreign policy is to preserve peace and, if the struggle against communism should turn to war, to have made it possible for other peoples in the world to have a common cause with us, so that, having effective partners, we will not have to bear the full load of combat alone. This means that the United States must not only be strong, but that it is highly desirable that our allies in the Atlantic Pact, the former neutral nations, the former enemy nations, and all stateless anti-Communist men, whether they be Slavs in Europe or Nationalist Chinese in the Far East, be able and willing and ready to make their military contribution. This was the purpose of legislation which would have made it possible for the United States actually to organize military units of stateless men—not just mercenaries or Hessians, but what is far better: volunteers for freedom who have a common cause with us. I believe that if such legislation had been passed in 1947, there would now be dependable military forces in many places where we must either employ Americans or do nothing.

The yardstick by which the success of foreign policy must be measured is thus basically the extent to which it provides resolute and effective partners so that the whole load will not be carried by our American military manpower. That manpower is our most precious resources.

We doubtless have more dollars per capita than any other nation, of which fact I used to be reminded in the United Nations, but obviously we have no more manpower per capita. In this respect all nations are alike and all alike should share the burden. It is for that reason, Mr. President, I say that those nations who have shared with us the burden of fighting in Korea are entitled to our very special consideration and appreciation.

II

The public announcement that a "great debate" is to be held in the Senate instinctively seems to invite a division of everyone into two groups. Apparently one must either be a "globalist" or a "retreatist." This creates a false impression. Actually a careful reading of the Senate discussion in the past few days, notably the speech of the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], shows substantial agreement on many fundamentals of future foreign policy, however much we may differ on what has happened in the past. To dispel the artificial idea that we here in the Senate are more divided than is actually the case, I should like to list 16 points of basic agreement:

First. We agree that constructive criticism is essential, that it adds strength to a nation's foreign policy and that the only unity which is worth having is the unity which comes after and not before such criticism has been urged. While we must not recriminate, call names, or pervert this awesome moment for political purposes, Monday-morning quarterbacking fills a useful purpose if it enables us to win next week's game. Bipartisanship emphatically does not oblige the minority to support the majority when it thinks the majority is wrong, just as bipartisanship does require the minority to support the majority when the majority is right. It is as simple as that. For the minority to prod the majority into making a greater effort to win this struggle is a solemn duty and a valuable characteristic of the two-party system. The minority can rightly contend that the struggle against communism did not start soon enough.

To this I add my own belief that it was with the help of minority leadership that the much maligned Eightieth Congress, by overwhelming votes, set up the Marshall plan, without which the fight against communism would be largely lost in Europe today, selective service legislation, and the Vandenberg resolution, which, if we rapidly take full advantage of the common action to which it pointed the way, can be a vital factor in saving the day for the free world. Incidentally, it was in connection with the Vandenberg resolution that I said in June 1948:

> The purpose of the Vandenberg resolution is to show that we are in sympathy with the broad trend of strengthening the freedom-loving countries, but it does not commit us to anything definite. They must make the showing. If they make a good showing and if it is advantageous to our national security to help them, we shall help them. If the showing is not good enough, we shall not help them. It is the most perfect arrangement from the standpoint of American interest that could possibly be imagined.

Second. We agree that the United States made a mistake in dissipating its Armed Forces in 1945, in failing correctly to estimate the aims of the Soviet Union, and in secretly agreeing at Yalta to decisions from which so much tragedy has flowed.

Third. We agree that we have an interest in the military strength of other nations and in their economic welfare. A revolution is under way in the world, and we cannot expect less favored nations to stand still and be content with the low living standards which they have always had. It is often stressed in the Senate that aid to other nations must only be undertaken to the extent that it benefits us. Of course, that is true, but I should like to point out that, while we have a selfish interest, it is obviously to our advantage by our words in Congress to avoid stressing as much as possible, and as often as we get the opportunity, a selfish attitude on our part.

Fourth. We agree that war is not inevitable and that it must be avoided.

Fifth. We agree that there is a determined plan to communize the world but that there is also no cause for panic.

Sixth. We certainly agree that we unfortunately cannot place our full reliance on the United Nations as a practical device to protect this country from aggression. The UN Charter sweepingly promises to repel aggression without there being the force which is able to do it. We put the cart before the horse. We do not wish to withdraw from the United Nations, certainly, and while we hope to build it up as time goes on, we must depend on our own strength and that of our partners to protect our security. May our partners be strong, and may they be numerous.

Seventh. We agree, too, that our first consideration must be the defense of America, that America can often be defended outside of America, but that if we undertake to respond, with military force, to every call for help in every part of the world we shall be bled white.

Eighth. Equally we agree that our major effort must be through our Air Force and our Navy. It has been clear since the end of World War II that if we were to maintain a proper Air Force and Navy, it would be far more difficult than in the past simultaneously to raise more than 35 or 40 American divisions. The World War I and II visions of a 100-division army are over. We now appreciate that if it becomes necessary, in the struggle against communism, for a major effort to be made on land—and that could happen—the United States cannot possibly make it alone. We need allies, either in the uniform of their country or in the uniform of the United States. There seems to be general agreement on that point both here and abroad.

Ninth. We also agree that a limited number of American divisions could be used in Europe as part of an Atlantic Pact force with advantageous results for us, provided that our military authorities favor their use.

Tenth. We agree with the idea expressed here in the Senate that the United States cannot abandon the rest of the world and rely solely on the defense of this continent and that we must do what we can so that Communist influence may not spread.

Eleventh. We agree that it would be obviously a colossal error to seek a decision by pitting our manpower and that of our partners against the teeming millions of Russia and China. Indeed, I know of no qualified student of the problem who wants to do this.

Twelfth. We can agree with the proposition that we should not force our decisions on nations who have no desire to arm themselves. To go further, we should not commit one single additional soldier to Europe without an iron-clad agreement that the dispatch of that soldier means the automatic commitment of a very much larger number of European soldiers. Such a commitment is not unfair to Europe since we will do so much in other ways. In truth, as I will try to demonstrate later, such a commitment could be highly advantageous both to Europe and to the United States.

Thirteenth. We also agree with the statement made here that we need a far more effective intelligence force and a great improvement in measures to help those who yearn for liberty in the satellite countries. In this connection, incidentally, the proposal for enlisting alien soldiers can be most helpful.

Fourteenth. We agree that our allies should make the greatest effort of which they are capable. Their stake is as great as ours.

I certainly agree with the statement, which may be more widely challenged, but which I have heard made on the other side of the aisle, that the dragging of feet of the nations of Western Europe has been much exaggerated. When a country like France, for example, votes conscription, increases its military budget by 75 percent in 1 year, substantially diminishes its entire program for the rebuilding of the areas which were devastated in World War II, undertakes to set up 10 modern divisions in 1 year in addition to the very large force of more than seven divisions which it maintains in Indochina, agrees to the rearmament of its traditional German enemy—and does all this after it has been bled white in two world wars—candidly, it seems to me that that compares favorably with what we have been doing over here. We, too, have been dragging our feet a good deal insofar as preparedness is concerned, and while part of the inadequacy of the effort in Europe is doubtless their own fault, part of it is also due to the fact that they were requested by the United States to put all their energies into economic production and not into national defense.

I know that there are those in all free nations who are "neutralists." I need hardly tell Senators that that sentiment exists here. There are tremendous separatist forces constantly trying to pull us and our partners apart and away from each other. There are forces in America seeking division for its own sake—not just honest disagreement over matters of judgment. It is not remarkable that separatist forces exist. What is remarkable and what gives hope for the future is the extent to which they have been and are being overcome. There is probably not a Senator here who does not think in his heart of hearts that it is better to fight abroad with the help of partners than to fight alone in the United States in the midst of the ruins of our great factories. Admittedly, the fighting of a land battle on American soil is not an immediate threat. But are we in the Senate concerned only with this year and next year? Have we no thought at all for our children and grandchildren? Unless we exercise some foresight and statesmanship they—and we—could confront conditions here which would make the dreadful overseas battles of World War II seem like the good old days. It is worth a great deal for a country with our limited and precious manpower resources not to have to stand alone, and we are justified in making sacrifices and in running risks to avoid such an outcome—to keep what partners we have and to add new ones.

Fifteenth. Then we can agree completely with the idea that we must have complete freedom to fight a war, if it comes, as we want to fight it. That goes for all the questions which war raises—Who? What? Where? When? and How?

Sixteenth. Finally, there is no doubt that Congress has the right and duty to determine the size of the Armed Forces, increasing or reducing them as it sees fit above or below the figure desired by the Executive.

Those are 16 points of substantial—though not unanimous—agreement. They seem to me to be numerous and overwhelmingly important. They certainly do not justify the impression either here or abroad that the Senate is split right down the middle with globalists on the one side and retreatists on the other.

In all truth—and I am very happy to say this—there are no fundamental principles which divide us. There are questions of degree and questions of method—but nothing which really goes to the heart of the matter. The most contentious question which a reading of the record discloses is the idea that American Armed Forces cannot be sent overseas without consent of Congress. But this is not an issue of principle; it is entirely an issue of degree and of method. Let me discuss it for a moment.

III

I share the great and legitimate concern which so sincerely animates Senators who make this proposal. Their sincerity is in the highest degree praiseworthy and it is to be hoped that some procedure can be devised to satisfy the legitimate worry which we all feel.

But it is hard to understand, Mr. President, how Members of the House and Senate, even making due allowances for their fine qualities, can possibly attempt to function as the operations section of a general staff and decide where and how and in what amount troops, ships, and planes should be sent to foreign lands. Assuming that we in Congress have the ability, how can we, with all our many other duties, possibly possess professional strategic knowledge? How can we preserve the secrecy and conduct the tactics of deception and surprise which are so essential if we are to debate troop movements?

Imagine a situation in which there are already two divisions overseas. If three more are sent, the total of five divisions might be successful, whereas if the two remained they might be lost.

In these considerations, two and two do not always make four. If we doubled the number of divisions, we may increase our power by more than twice. If we cut the number of divisions in half, we may decrease the power of our forces by much more than half.

To determine whether or not these three additional divisions should be sent requires knowledge of logistics, terrain, enemy capabilities, and a host of other factors which men go to West Point, to the Command and General Staff School, and to the Regular Army in order to learn. Are we to start making such decisions here?

If we require congressional approval for sending troops abroad, how can the President carry out his oath of office and take the steps which are required by the Constitution to "preserve, protect, and defend" the United States if a crisis should come when Congress is not in session? If we undertake to decide such questions in Congress, we shall defeat ourselves probably more quickly than an enemy could do it. We would be putting ourselves on the spot when we did not have to do so. In the language of the prize ring we would be "telegraphing our punches." Ship, plane, and troop movements must be decided by the Executive. Read the history of the War Between the States and the unhappy experiences of the congressional Committee on the Conduct of the War.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Under the Constitution of the United States, in time of war I take it the Commander in Chief has unquestioned authority over the Army, and may conduct the war in any way he sees fit. I would question even the constitutional right of the Congress to attempt to stop him from doing so.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TAFT. However, in the case at hand, it seems to me that we have a question of foreign policy rather than of arms. We have a question of whether or not we are going to commit the United States. Certainly there is a tremendous difference between sending an army of 30 divisions to Europe and occupying Germany with two divisions as a force of occupation. Those are basic questions, which it seems to me are well within the authority of Congress to determine in time of peace.

Is it not true also that for many years the law provided that the President could send no troops outside of continental United States in time of peace?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Ohio was not in the Chamber when I made the earlier reference to that point. I stated that there is substantial agreement here—and I base that on a reading of the speech of the Senator from Ohio—that it would be a proper thing to send a limited number of divisions to Europe if our military authorities thought it would be advantageous to do so.

Mr. TAFT. No; if it would accord with the general policy which Congress might think desirable—not because our generals might think so. I do not think the generals have anything to do with the question.

Mr. LODGE. I will find the quotation.

Mr. TAFT. "In the general spirit of the Atlantic Pact," I said.

Mr. LODGE. This is what the Senator from Ohio said:

> I should not object to committing some limited number of American divisions to work with them in the general spirit of the Atlantic Pact.

Mr. TAFT. Yes; but I did not say that that was to be determined by any generals or necessarily on any military basis. It is a question of foreign policy, as I see it, which is wholly within the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I presume the Senator would not want to send them to Europe if the generals thought it was unwise to do so from a military standpoint.

Mr. TAFT. No. My objection to sending them to Europe at all is based on the fact that I cannot see the safety of any such movement. I cannot see that it would not rather in the first place induce war as a question of foreign policy, and, in the second place, that it would not induce a war which would be most disastrous to the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to come to that point of whether it is a provocation or not.

Mr. TAFT. I am here only raising the question as to whether the nature of the commitment for Europe is not primarily now a question of foreign policy and not a question of military policy. That is the point.

Mr. LODGE. I have been endeavoring to say that to try to draw a line between foreign policy and military policy today is like trying to cut a pail of water in two. They are absolutely merged together and we cannot have the one without the other.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Not now. Before I yield to the Senator from Louisiana I wish further to respond to the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Ohio is quite right in saying that there is a great difference between sending a limited number of divisions in the spirit of the Atlantic Pact, which is one thing and to which, I gather, there is no objection, and sending a huge land force, which is another thing. I will agree at once that those two points are entirely different. If we are going to go beyond sending a limited number of divisions in the spirit of the Atlantic Pact, then certainly that calls for a major policy decision in which Congress should participate. I do not think there is any occasion to send a major land force to Europe. In the first place we have not a major land force to send even if we wanted to. It would be absolutely out of the question to do it. All that is involved here is a question of sending a limited number of troops to Europe. We already have two divisions in Europe, and I have not heard anyone suggest that we withdraw those two divisions.

Certainly, I said when the Senator from Ohio was not here, when we withdrew the two divisions from Korea in 1949 it turned out to be a colossal mistake, and I do not think I have heard anyone on the floor suggest that we withdraw the two divisions from Germany.

Mr. TAFT. I do not think there are many troops to withdraw at the moment, but I do not think that changes the question, because the President has now proposed to Congress that we create a great land army of many divisions. In his request for 3,500,000 troops Monday I would say that at least 2,000,000 of those certainly are to be in the land army, and consequently whatever is determined now will be applied when those divisions are created. I said that that is a consideration we should dismiss for the moment from our consideration.

Mr. LODGE. What the administration wants in the way of an army is 18 divisions. I do not think by any stretch of the imagination that would be called a vast army. If 18 is vast then what is 61, which is what we had in Europe alone in World War II? We have got to get another adjective. We have seven divisions in Korea, and we are starting to build a total of 11 more to be ready by the end of this year some time. That is not a vast land army.

Mr. TAFT. Is it the Senator's understanding that to get 18 divisions we have to have 2,000,000 men in the Army in uniform, besides another million civilians?

Mr. LODGE. I cannot answer that question. I do not know offhand how many civilians it takes in the War Department to have 18 divisions in the field.

Mr. TAFT. Roughly speaking one civilian to two men in uniform seems to be the general rule.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator is trying to get me to admit that the military are great wasters of manpower, I will hurriedly and enthusiastically agree with him. I think there is no question about that. I should like to see our military department utilize manpower very efficiently.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator does not agree legally with the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that the President has power to send troops anywhere in the world in any quantity where the security of the United States is involved? I think those are the words the Senator from Texas used.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Massachusetts has spent his time in the Senate trying to say what he, as the Senator from Massachusetts believes; and not to say whether he disagrees with paragraph 8 of a statement made by the Senator from Texas, or paragraph 3 of a statement made by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. This is the main subject of debate. What does the Senator from Massachusetts think of the President's power, in time of peace, to send troops anywhere in the world where the security of the United States is involved?

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator from Ohio came into the Chamber I said that I would much prefer to discuss the question on the basis of common sense and wisdom, and what is involved in this question, rather than to get into a legal question. I am not a lawyer, for one thing. I think if we could all agree on what was wise and what was practical and what was advantageous we would not find any legal obstacles in the way.

The President takes the oath of office—I believe I am quoting correctly—"to preserve, protect, and defend" the United States. That is a pretty big commitment. I think one of the things that is confusing us in this country so much, and confusing the free world so much, and helping the Soviet so much, is that we here are used to thinking that we are either at peace or war. This means that if we are at war the President can do this—a certain thing. If we are not, he cannot. Of course, the Soviet are not tied down by any legalistic principles of that kind. I do not know whether they have any law schools, and if they have, whether any of the members of the Politburo attended them. I believe they operate without them. They operate equally well whether it is good weather or foggy weather. In fact, they work better in the fog.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts as one who has had a large amount of experience in World War II as a combat officer of the United States, whether it might not be entirely possible that some of the factors that determine how many troops would be needed in Europe might depend largely on secret matters which could not be safely trusted to 96 United States Senators and four-hundred-and-thirty-some-odd Representatives for debate on the floor of the Senate and the House?

Mr. LODGE. I think that is true. I tried to make that point a moment ago. The question of deciding the matter of troop movements and ship movements and plane movements is highly technical. Persons who must make such decisions ought not to have to do anything else. They ought not to be obliged to study a multiplicity of domestic legislation, or make speeches, or answer mail, as Senators do. What such men should decide ought to be in the interest of the young men who are engaged in combat. Men who have to make such decisions ought not to have to make decisions on other questions.

Mr. LONG. Would there not also be the question of time involved? The executive must be able to decide in a relatively short period of time what, in the executive opinion, should be done. However, if an attempt were made to make a decision respecting the sending of one or two more divisions to Europe, the question of whether to send not two but three and so forth, and that had to be debated on the floor of the Senate and the House, an interminable time might expire before a decision could finally be reached by a majority of 96 Senators and 435 Representatives respecting the number of divisions that should be sent.

Mr. LODGE. I think that is correct.

IV

Let us now consider the question of "who" will bear the brunt and "where" the effort is to be made and of "how" it is to be done.

In response to the question of who, my conviction is that, in addition to the United States, there must be the help of our allies in the Atlantic Pact, of the former enemy nations, of the former neutrals, and of the stateless anti-Communist men.

When it comes to how, it is obvious that, if there should be war, the American main effort must be by air and sea but that the allied main effort can also have a substantial army. The statement that the Air Force is the one weapon which can damage those bases from which air attack can be made upon us is not completely accurate. Strong, effective army occupation of a hostile base is another weapon which can achieve a result not merely by damaging the enemy but by neutralizing him completely. Sea and air power cannot at all times and under all conditions, particularly in a struggle with a tremendous land power, achieve complete protection.

To answer the question where, we must first of all make up our minds that if the Ruhr and Japan were to fall, the whole strategic picture would become almost inconceivably serious. These are the two great industrial potentials which are still in the free world. If the Ruhr and the great shipyards of Western Europe were taken by a hostile aggressor, it would not be long before our present ascendancy in air and naval power would be neutralized. Anyone who is a strong advocate of American air and naval supremacy should realize that a prime requisite for maintaining that supremacy is to prevent the aggressors from intervening in the Ruhr and Japan. This is not interventionism by America; it is simply an attempt to hold what we already have.

This raises clearly the question of the defense of Western Europe against aggression. The word "defense" is to be stressed. There is no question here of our adopting aggressive tactics based on Western Europe and aimed at the Soviet Union. It is hard to understand how anyone can contend that the development of a defensive holding force in Europe without serious offensive capabilities could look like aggression to such realistic men as the rulers of the Kremlin. The same Senators say, almost in the same breath, that the building of an army in Europe would be regarded as aggression by the Soviets and that undoubtedly the Soviets would destroy that army within a few months after it was begun. If the army would be so easy to destroy, how could the Soviets seriously believe that it had a serious aggressive potential?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator seems to pass over the element of time; he seems to wipe time off the books. Of course, in time it is possible to build an army. However, the only suggestion which has been made is that until an army is built, it is at the mercy of the Soviets. An army in the process of being built might reach the point where it was easy to wipe out when the Soviets moved in—which is the basis of the whole thesis.

Mr. LODGE. No; the basis of the thesis is not that the Soviets have that intention in regard to all forms of armed force development at all.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Furthermore, how is it possible to have an army which is absolutely able to defend Europe but does not have all the offensive potentialities capable of taking from the Russians a large part of their possessions?

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to try to give an opinion on that point. I think one of the ways in which Switzerland maintained its neutrality—to give a small example—was by maintaining a strong army which had very great defensive power, but relatively small offensive power. If we give a man a rifle, he has some offensive power, of course. But obviously the Atlantic Pact force, even if it lived up to the highest expectations of its supporters, could never outnumber the 175 divisions the Soviet Union is supposed to have. If we read the history of the campaigns of the Third Army, for instance—General Patton's army—I think it will be found that before that army, which certainly was one of the best armies in World War II, took the offensive against the Germans, it had built up a superiority of almost 3 to 1, as I recall the figures. That is one reason why I think the Atlantic Pact force can never develop offensive possibilities.

Moreover, as I understand, it is not even believed that the relatively small Atlantic Pact force will have very serious defensive capabilities, unless it has strong tactical aviation support. That is why I say I am sure the Soviets have no worries about ever having that force become an offensive threat to them.

Of course, the potential American offensive threat arises from the capacity of our Air Force to drop atomic bombs; and, of course, that is a very strong offensive potential.

Mr. TAFT. Is it not true that a tactical air force is just as effective for offense as for defense?

Mr. LODGE. No; not necessarily, in all cases.

Mr. TAFT. Why not?

Mr. LODGE. A tactical air force is not necessarily always as effective for offense as for defense, because it often must go farther when it engages in offense.

Mr. TAFT. It simply goes from just behind the lines, in either case.

Mr. LODGE. However, by means of a succession of strong points we try to canalize the enemy's advance—well, we should not be talking about these things in public, so there is no use in going into these matters at this time. I see that I am about to begin to violate the precept I suggested when I began to speak, namely, that in these debates we should not discuss detailed tactics. However, I shall be glad to go to the Senator's office at any time and explain to him why I think this defensive army can never develop offensive potentialities against a Russian force.

Mr. TAFT. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that we can build up such a defensive army which can have no offensive capabilities?

Mr. LODGE. No serious offensive capabilities.

Mr. TAFT. Is not that just the Maginot-line complex?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. TAFT. Is it not true that, regardless of whether a force moves forward or moves backward, there is a war in either case?

Mr. LODGE. It would be the Maginot-line complex if we were to envision a third world war as being fought entirely in Western Europe. But, of course, we do not visualize it in that way, because it will be a triphibious war, if it comes. If we hold at one point and attack at another, that is not a Maginot line, if we proceed everywhere in accordance with a triphibious concept——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Is it not also true that an army representing not only the United States, but also France, Belgium, Holland, and other smaller nations, would not be an army which the powers in control of it would agree to use to attack any great power? That army could be used only for defense, because the smaller powers never would agree that their forces should be used to attack Soviet Russia. Does not the Senator agree?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. I think it is simply incredible to think that the French, the Belgians, the Dutch, and other nations, could possibly get themselves into a condition to march on Moscow. I think it is the most fantastic dream one could imagine.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Does the Senator understand that the army which will be built up there will never be able to defeat the Russians if they attack?

Mr. LODGE. No; that is not the point. I am sorry the Senator was not here earlier.

Mr. CAPEHART. But a moment ago I understood the Senator to say that the army would be a defensive army and never could be an offensive army against the Russians.

Mr. LODGE. No; I said it could have no serious offensive capabilities.

Mr. CAPEHART. No serious offensive capabilities?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I said.

Mr. CAPEHART. Those are strong terms.

Mr. LODGE. I say it has no serious offensive capabilities.

Mr. CAPEHART. If Russia were to attack the United States from some place other than through Western Europe, what good would we get from the Western European army we are talking about?

Mr. LODGE. It would be good as a holding force, as a dam. Recently we heard ex-President Hoover talk about such a dam.

Mr. CAPEHART. Suppose the Russians should decide to attack us from South America, from Alaska, or from some point other than Western Europe. What good would the Western European army be in that case?

Mr. LODGE. That question requires a long answer; but a quick answer is that such an army would keep the Russians from obtaining the Western European shipyards and other industrial plants. That is at least one good reason for maintaining such an army.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. I should like first to answer the question asked by the Senator from Indiana, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall yield to the Senator from Minnesota as soon as I have answered the Senator from Indiana.

I should like to say to the Senator from Indiana that of course he is correct that all these things should be ready. If they are not ready, of course, they are not any good. That is true.

Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, at the time the able Senator from Indiana asked his question of the Senator from Massachusetts, this question occurred to me: If the Soviets should attack the United States, what should we do? If the Soviets should attack us, if the sirens were to scream the announcement of the attack this very afternoon, I think we would want bases all over the European Continent, in order that we could make a speedy and effective strike, because we would have to strike fast, or else all our centers of communication and centers and hearts of production on this continent would be shattered. Therefore, the possession of bases on the Continent is, in my opinion, absolutely essential to our safety.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield, so that I may answer the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Of course, the able Senator from Minnesota misses the point of the debate. The able Senator from Massachusetts said that the army which is being built up is for defensive purposes and could never be, or might not be effective offensively against Russia. That was the point in the debate, not what the able Senator from Minnesota is talking about.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield further?

Mr. LODGE. I am trying to give what I said before the Senator from Ohio came in. I quoted from his very able and interesting speech a good deal, to show that we are not very far apart, and I am very happy about it. I suppose there are some people who wish that we here in the Senate would divide up into globalists on one side and retreatists on the other, but when we can find a common ground on any matter I think it is a fine thing. I agree with those who are filled with horror at the idea of a huge allied army marching through the snows into the middle of Russia. I am just as much opposed to that as is any other Member of the Senate, and that is why I am so happy to find that everybody agrees with me about that, in the first place; and I am so happy to find that nobody contemplates doing such a thing, in the second place.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I have one question. The Senator has emphasized the value of the Ruhr. Is it not true that even with an army in Europe it is very uncertain whether we could do anything but defend the Rhine anyway? And is it not most likely that that would involve a surrender of the Ruhr?

Mr. LODGE. We are now getting into the topics which I said at the beginning we should not discuss, because if in the United States Senate we start talking about the places we are going to leave and the places we are going to hold, it is all going to be cabled by the able ladies and gentlemen of the press all over the world, and the people who are living in the countries that we say we are not going to hold will read about it, and we will lose some partners whom we might otherwise have.

Mr. TAFT. Is it not true——

Mr. LODGE. Let me answer.

Mr. TAFT. Let me put it in this way——

Mr. LODGE. Let me answer the Senator. I am trying to answer him, and to answer him in my own way. I cannot answer the Senator from Ohio in his way; I must answer him in my way. So I say that, if it is desired to hold line B, it is a good thing to say that we will hold line A. If we propose to hold line A, and to try to hold line A, then we may be able to hold line B. Does that answer the question?

Mr. TAFT. Is it not also true that the chief reliance in World War II was the bombing of the Ruhr, and cannot the production there be very substantially reduced at least by bombing?

Mr. LODGE. The idea of bombing the Ruhr and destroying all the people in the Ruhr is one that does not appeal to me. I do not think it is a good solution for the problem which we face.

Mr. TAFT. The Essen plant was never taken by the Allies in the late World War.

Mr. LODGE. I am not talking about what was done. I thought the Senator was advocating it for the future. I think it is unfortunate for us publicly to advocate the bombing of this area, and that. I think it is a mistake.

Mr. TAFT. With due respect, I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts I am not advocating anything.

Mr. LODGE. I am sorry if I misinterpreted the Senator's suggestions.

Mr. TAFT. I am only trying to answer the Senator's argument that we must retain the Ruhr because of its industrial potentialities to Russia and the possible occupation of the Ruhr; and I was suggesting that bombing is one method of meeting that particular problem, as well as a land army in Europe. That is all I wanted to bring out.

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt that bombing is a weapon we can use if we have to; but I think it is a last resort. As I have said, I think we ought to try to keep the free world as big as we can, where we think we have a good chance of being successful.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I have been very much interested in the Senator's remarks, and I think he has made a very fine contribution to this debate. I believe he has left some unfortunate implications as to his theory of the military purpose of forces in Western Europe. Early in his debate he spoke of the necessity, in substance, of our selling our goods to our western allies. I doubt very much whether we would sell a case to the western allies, if we ask them to become a completely garrisoned state, and to do nothing but sit on the defensive while they are bombed out by the enemy. If that is good tactics for Western Europe, it is good tactics for the United States. I think the Senator has left some bad implications, which perhaps he did not intend to convey.

Mr. LODGE. I do not follow the Senator. What is there wrong——

Mr. MILLIKIN. Did I understand the Senator correctly to say, in substance, that the purpose of the Western European armies is defensive?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. That is correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. That means that they stand still. It means that they take the blows of the enemy. The Ruhr would be blown up, everything else blown up, no movement. They would take the enemy's attacks. Is that a constructive piece of salesmanship for Western Europe?

Mr. LODGE. I doubt whether anybody even——

Mr. MILLIKIN. I put the complementary question: If that is the proper tactics for Western Europe, why not for the United States?

Mr. LODGE. I can answer that.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think that both are bad.

Mr. LODGE. I can answer that. I do not think that even so persuasive a gentleman as my friend from Colorado could sell the idea to anyone that war is attractive. I think the idea of fighting a defensive war in Europe is not going to be attractive. I grant that to be so. I think the idea of an offensive war into the cold wastes of Siberia is not very attractive either, and I do not think the Senator from Colorado means seriously to advocate such a course.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I would not, sir.

Mr. LODGE. Wait a minute. Let me answer. The Senator has raised both points. I should like to answer them both. The second argument was that if a defensive war is the proper course for Europe, why is it not the proper course for the United States? There is a very simple answer to that, which is, of course, that our situation is far stronger; we are in a far more advantageous position strategically. We are not nearly so weak or so divided and so up against the gun as are the people of Europe, and therefore we have a good chance to regain the initiative, so that the arrow of pressure will be pointing from west to east. One of the first things that must be done in order to regain the basic strategic initiative is that there be a dam in Europe insofar as the offensive threat of the Red Army is concerned. But that is just a small part of the whole strategic picture.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am in entire agreement that we should pick up effective allies in Western Europe. Let there be no question about that. I am opposed to falling back on the United States and adopting a cornered-rat defense policy.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Very well. But I do not like the implications of the Senator's argument that we should sell our allies by giving them help, merely to reduce them to the complete inertia of a defensive status, which is the Maginot line business, as has been pointed out.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I do not think that is what happens at all. I think either the Army is going to have a defensive role or an offensive role. If it is going to have an offensive role, then there are Senators who are opposed to that, because they say it takes us into a highly dangerous adventure into Russia; and, of course, I agree with them. Then, if we say it is going to be a defensive army, that idea is opposed by the Senator from Colorado. If both arguments are good, then the only army which is any good is one which merely stands still in one place and does not move at all.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I do not accept either of the alternatives as exclusive. I believe in an offensive and defensive program, according to the task before us. I think we make a big mistake when we consign Western Europe to being solely a defensive military area.

Mr. LODGE. We shall be very lucky, I may say to the Senator, if we can be defensive in the next 2 or 3 years. We can thank our stars if that can be achieved. I am not urging that Europe be turned into a garrison state; far from it. I think that the army in any country has got to rest on a sound political and economic basis, and I do not think Europe can arm itself faster than at a certain rate. That is one of the reasons why I think the Marshall plan has been such an excellent thing, because it has provided the economic basis on which an army can now be built. There is nothing I have said, I may say to my able friend from Colorado, which justifies the inference that I want to turn Europe into a garrison state. I want to do no such thing.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I believe that when the Senator studies the RECORD there will be a number of remarks which he has made which lead to that conclusion, and I think that would be a very unfortunate conclusion, if we are out to pick up allies.

Mr. LODGE. I am not for turning any country into a garrison state, and I am not for engaging in a wild adventure in which we commit a huge land army to an invasion of the wasteland of Siberia. I am not in favor of pitting our precious and limited store of manpower against the teeming millions of Russia or China. I am not in favor of doing those things.

Mr. MILLIKIN. But——

Mr. LODGE. Just a moment. Let me finish. The Senator raises big questions, and he is entitled to an adequate answer. I believe the principal effort must be made through air and through naval power, but that the allied main effort in certain parts of the world can be advantageously made by land. If that be true, then we can put in our percentage there. I am coming to what I think that percentage might be, but there is nothing in what I have said this afternoon which justifies any inference that I am doing anything other than seeking to regain the initiative—to regain the initiative for permanent peace, which we threw away in 1945 and 1946, when we allowed our Armed Forces to disintegrate, when we failed to estimate correctly the aims and aspirations of the Soviet Union, and when we lost the initiative. That has been the whole trouble.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am not quarreling with any of the general objectives of the Senator from Massachusetts. I am merely suggesting, and I repeat my suggestion, that if he will study the remarks he has made this afternoon perhaps he will see that may be fairly argued that the net effect is that we would turn Western Europe into a garrison state. I am also interested in having effective allies in Western Europe.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. What kind of an army does the Senator want to build in Western Europe?

Mr. MILLIKIN. An army that can go forward, that would have whatever mobility is necessary to win the war.

Mr. LODGE. There are 175 Soviet divisions and there are 8 Allied divisions. How can we have such a mobile army in the near future?

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator is arguing that there is no point in doing anything.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I am not. The Senator from Colorado is trying to "lawyer" me around to taking an extreme position. It is not a question of globalism or retreatism. It is a question of common sense, and not of legalism.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator has indicated that there is a sensible ground somewhere between, and that is where I place myself. I do not want the Senator to render rigid half of his problem——

Mr. LODGE. I am not rigid at all. I am mentally mobile, and I think that most of us are.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I want the Senator to be mentally mobile, and I want him to keep our military forces mobile—not always moving backward.

Mr. LODGE. This has come about because of the statement made here that to build up this force in Europe will be an aggressive threat and cause the Soviet to rush into war.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am not taking issue on that. I was merely hoping I was making a friendly suggestion to the Senator that in the interest of those who are not retreatists or not globalists that he not jeopardize a good, sound, mobile position by making half of it rigidly defensive.

I want to make one more suggestion. I think the Senator is quite correct when he shrinks from discussing what points should be bombed and what points should not be bombed, but I do not think there is any secret about certain points that would be inevitably bombed. I am not talking about them or urging the Senator to talk about them, but I would suggest that if the Senator would discuss his strong-point theory it would be an interesting addition to the argument. There is no secrecy about it. War has operated on strong-point theories since the beginning of warfare.

Mr. LODGE. We have not operated on strong-point theories with tactical aviation since the beginning of warfare. I should be glad to discuss any of these things with the Senator off the record, but I do not think we should point out on the floor of the Senate places and areas when it would be reported all over the world.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am partially agreeing with the Senator, but I am saying that it would be a valuable adjunct to his argument if he would go into his strong-point theory and let us see what it has to offer. Maybe it will make the curse of the garrison state part of the subject.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator has conjured up something which is not really involved.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Let us call it static warfare or semiretreatism.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to join issue with the Senator now, but I do not think we should do so.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I do not shrink from that. I wish the Senator to know that I do not shrink from it. Does the Senator from Massachusetts shrink from it?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we should discuss in public tactics and places and methods of fighting.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The routes of forward and backward moving of armies in Europe are no more secret than that the two of us are on the Senate floor this afternoon.

Mr. LODGE. That is true.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The study of strategy and tactics deals with well known routes of advance and retreat; and to say we should not discuss it——

Mr. LODGE. That is not what I said we should not discuss. The Senator is a very able man, but he cannot possibly know what it is that I do not want to discuss now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should certainly hate to base a debate on something that I do not want to discuss.

Mr. LODGE. I am not basing my debate on it at all.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I have listened with interest to my colleague from Massachusetts. In what I am about to say do I not state his concept correctly? As it lies in my mind, what the Senator wants to do and what I want to do is to keep Europe in a sufficiently strong position so that it can help us to defend ourselves here, and if they have the willingness and the strength, we will help them to defend themselves over there. Our position is that we want to help to keep Europe intact so that we can develop an offensive warfare in the air, if necessary, and warfare on the sea, if necessary, and keep Europe, as such, strong, and keep her as our ally for our own security. Is not that the Senator's position?

Mr. LODGE. I think that is just about it. We want to be able to conduct this struggle, which is a military, political, and economic struggle, all three. It is like a three-pronged spear. We should like to conduct the struggle in an offensive, aggressive, forward-looking manner. We should like to, but we cannot do that now. Let us consider an army corps in battle. It is not attacking with everything all the time. It is going to be quiet at some places. At some places the bridges are out, or there is snow in the mountain passes. I have never heard of a military commander who said we should go on the offensive in everything. The fact is that we have a great advantage on the sea and in the air, but we are weak on the land. It seems to me it would be insane to say that we are going to take the offensive on the land, where we are weak, and go on the defensive in the air and on the sea, where we are strong.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is my understanding of what the Senator meant. Let us compare it with a football team. We may compare the land army with the line buck, and the Navy and the Air Force with the forward pass. If we can maintain our strength so that we can forward pass, we may win the battle in that way, even though we cannot win it by line bucks.

Mr. LODGE. That is true. Moreover, there may not be a war at all if we speedily regain the initiative.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I recognize the great study which the Senator from Massachusetts has given to military activities. Is it not an axiom of modern warfare that each side seeks to destroy the industrial potential of the enemy?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know what the axioms are. We try to damage the enemy as much as is possible.

Mr. BREWSTER. Was it not the entire strategy in the last war to destroy the industrial potential of the enemy?

Mr. LODGE. It was certainly an objective.

Mr. BREWSTER. It is a major objective, is it not? That is the mission of air power, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. Not entirely, no.

Mr. BREWSTER. Not entirely; but one of the primary objects is the destruction of the enemy's industrial potential. I ask that question only in connection with the Senator's comment that he wanted to keep secret what we might do. I have been in Germany, as has the Senator from Massachusetts, and no German is under any illusion with reference to the Ruhr. Russia may well think she can keep that potential without destroying it. Is there anyone of the simplest mind who does not recognize that fact?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know who recognizes it and who does not recognize it, but I think we have a very delicate problem in Europe—many problems, in fact. Our problem involves the rearmament of Germany.

Mr. BREWSTER. I have one other question.

Mr. LODGE. Let me first answer the Senator's question. The rearmament of Germany is an extremely difficult political question. A great many Germans are very much against rearmament. I do not think it is a very good idea, when the question is up in Europe and General Eisenhower has his mind full of these things, to go into a great detailed discussion of where we would bomb in case things got bad. I may be wrong, but that is my judgment.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I have one other question.

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. As a matter of Yankee salesmanship, does the Senator think it would be more persuasive to tell Europe that since Europe is vital to our own defense we will defend it whether the European nations do anything themselves, or to tell them that there are some powerful conservative groups in this country who would help out those countries who are willing to help themselves, and that therefore they should help those forces who agree with them? I say that because the President used some unfortunate language in intimating that without Europe we are lost. It may be true, but is it wise for us to inculcate that theory, when General Eisenhower is in Europe trying to persuade European countries to cooperate with us in a united defense?

Mr. LODGE. I have never used that phrase. That is not my language. I went to Europe on my own early in December, in response to an invitation, to address a group of politicians over there. I spoke to them very much along the line of the statement of the Senator from Maine, that they carried a great responsibility for the success of an American foreign policy of alliances, and that they should make their full effort, because there are elements in our country which want to go alone and do not want to have any alliances at all. Before the Senator from Maine came into the Chamber I cited France, as an example. I cited what the French people had done as an indication of the fact that they took that fact to heart. Also, before the Senator came into the Chamber, I stated that the nations of Europe must make the utmost effort of which they were capable. Of course, we cannot demand that they make an effort of which they are not capable. I do think that they ought to make the utmost effort of which they are capable. We should not send one additional man to Europe without an iron-clad agreement that Europe would put up many more men.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to refer to his prepared speech at page 5, and to read from it his point No. 12?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. I read:

12. We can agree with the proposition that we should not force our decisions on nations who have no desire to arm themselves. To go further, we should not commit one single additional soldier to Europe without an iron-clad agreement that the dispatch of that soldier means the automatic commitment of a very much larger number of European soldiers. Such a commitment is not unfair to Europe since we will do so much in other ways.

I am certain the Senator from Massachusetts had in mind the furnishing of materials to the Army, Navy, and Air Corps.

In truth, as I will try to demonstrate later, such a commitment could be highly advantageous both to Europe and to the United States.

Is that not in substance exactly what ex-President Hoover advocated in his speech some 3 weeks ago?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know. I would have to reread the speech to be certain.

Mr. CAPEHART. I think the able Senator will find that it is exactly what former President Hoover advocated in his speech some 3 weeks ago. I congratulate the Senator from Massachusetts for placing it in his speech. I agree with him 100 percent. The Senator keeps talking about retreatists. I stand foursquare with what I have read from the Senator's speech, namely, point 12. I believe in it 100 percent. I would not go an inch farther than the Senator has advocated in paragraph 12. However, does that mean I am a retreatist? Why does the Senator use the word "retreatist" in referring to those of us who think there may be a better way of doing things?

Mr. LODGE. I have not applied the term to anyone. There are those in this country who would seek to divide us. The whole burden of my song has been that we are not very far apart, that we are not divided right down the middle, and that there is a basis of agreement in this country. I am very happy to see that there is such a basis of agreement. It may not be so interesting to the galleries, for example, to find that we are rather close to agreement, but I think it is a very good thing for the country, including the people in the galleries, that we are close to agreement. I am not calling anyone any names. I never do that.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree 100 percent with the Senator that we all have the same desire for peace, and that we all want to help stop the threat of communism. However, why should those of us who have alternate proposals to make be singled out and called such names?

Mr. LODGE. I am called names, too, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. I understand. Why cannot we have open debate on the floor of the Senate and recognize the fact that an alternative plan could be better, particularly in the light of the fact that the plans which we have been following for the past 20 years certainly have failed to accomplish the purposes for which they were intended? Therefore, is it not time that we take a look at some alternative plans?

Mr. LODGE. I think we ought to look at everything. That is what I want to do. I believe we should keep reexamining everything and keep an open mind. I think it is very proper indeed.

Mr. President, I should now like to continue with my prepared address.

If the Soviets have 175 divisions, and if 30 of those divisions are poised in Europe ready for attack, and if there are 8 Allied divisions in Western Europe, as I believe is the case, it is obvious that an almost astronomical rate of growth has to be achieved for the west to develop any serious offensive capabilities by land of a serious nature. In fact, it will be a very arduous undertaking even to develop a strong defensive force.

Certainly no American troops, planes, or ships should be sent anywhere in the world unless the responsible American military authorities think that their mission has a good prospect of success. That is basic. It must be the law and the prophets insofar as we in the Senate are concerned. If the military authorities think that it is profitable to take a certain course—even though that course may be politically unattractive to us in the United States—we must not let the political factors deter us from giving our support. We here in the Senate cannot possibly tell whether ships, planes, or troops should or should not profitably be sent to any particular area.

If our military leaders decide that limited numbers of American troops could be advantageously sent to Europe the question certainly arises as to how many and how soon. To be realistic let it be noted that it is impossible for us now to send a large land force to Europe because we have not got a large land force. We still have a goal of only 18 divisions by the end of the fiscal year, and the commitments which we have in Korea, plus the training requirements of the new divisions, make it utterly impossible for a large land force to go to Europe. The idea that we can in any near future send a million and a half men to Europe—which is the figure which I have heard—seems to me fanciful.

I do not like to burden the Senate with figures, but I think these are interesting figures. In discussing last September this question of manpower in Europe I pointed out that in World War II the allies had a total of 90 divisions on the western front. Of this number, 61 were American divisions, 18 were from the British Empire, 10 were French, and 1 was Polish. This makes a ratio of 61 United States divisions to 29 foreign divisions, or slightly more than 2 to 1, or about 70 percent.

It is commonly stated in the press that 60 divisions actually on station and in good locations in the eastern portion of the non-Communist part of Europe, supported by adequate tactical aviation and backed by still more divisions which could be in action within 6 weeks, could decisively stand off an aggressor. If the United States were to contribute 10 of these initial divisions, the ratio of United States troops to European troops would be far more favorable to us than was the case in World War II. It would be the difference between a ratio of 1 to 6 as compared with the ratio of 2 to 1, which existed in World War II. In percentage terms, the percentage would be 16½ percent instead of 70 percent.

At the present time, with eight divisions in Western Europe, of which two are American, our percentage is 25 percent. That percentage seems high.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. In the percentage figures which the Senator has stated with respect to World War II, the Senator left out the Russians.

Mr. LODGE. I said "on the western front."

Mr. TAFT. The Senator omitted the Russians, who were a vital factor in the result.

Mr. LODGE. I am talking about the western front.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator talks about 90 divisions on the western front. Our allies in Western Europe had more than 90 divisions. Does the Senator mean those actually on the front at any one time, and actually fighting?

Mr. LODGE. In combat.

Mr. CAPEHART. Our allies had a total of 260 divisions.

Mr. LODGE. These figures come from the War Department.

Mr. CAPEHART. Evidently the figures mean divisions on the front actually fighting at any given time.

Mr. LODGE. Divisions in the line.

Mr. CAPEHART. In World War II our allies had a total of 260 divisions.

Mr. LODGE. Counting the Russians.

Mr. CAPEHART. No; the western Allies.

Mr. LODGE. My figures come from the Pentagon.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am certain that they mean divisions fighting at any one given time.

Mr. LODGE. At the present time, with eight divisions in Western Europe, of which two are American, our percentage is 25 percent. That percentage seems high. I hope that this percentage may be reduced with the passage of time and that it will be around 15 percent at the very most—of which a significant number would be stateless volunteers for freedom fighting in our uniform.

There are those who ask: "Why have any American troops in Europe at all? There are 200,000,000 Europeans and only 150,000,000 Americans. Let them carry the load."

This question ignores the fact that the 200,000,000 peoples of Europe are divided into a series of watertight compartments and both literally and figuratively do not even speak the same language. Moreover, every man fights better when he thinks he has a good chance to win, and every man knows that his chance of winning is greater if he is part of a large unified allied force instead of merely being part of a small national army.

To say that we will not extend any help to the nations of Europe until they are completely strong and do not need our help is like telling a sick man that we will not give him his medicine until he has recovered. The test should not be that they are able to carry the load alone; it should be that they are making the greatest effort which they are capable of making.

It was proven in combat in World War II, notably in the Colmar pocket, that the presence of United States troops in the same sector noticeably increased the will to win of European armies. The greater the fighting stamina of the European soldier, the more of the load of combat he will carry, and the lighter becomes the load of combat which is carried by the American soldier. When the presence of our soldiers increases the fighting qualities of our European allies, we actually do ourselves a favor—all other things being equal—by having limited numbers of our troops in Europe where they will do the most good.

V

I now come to my few concluding remarks. It is said that if we mobilize now we shall have a difficult morale problem. This is only true if our leadership cannot rise to the occasion. To say that the American people will not support a real mobilization is to take counsel of one's fears. It is like saying that the nations of Europe will not fight. It is like saying that a bank is insolvent. If enough people say it, it will start a run on the bank. We must not allow ourselves to get into the state of mind of the man who is always trying to guess right and to win his bet even though he bets that a disaster is going to happen. Instead of trying to guess what is going to happen, we ought to be trying to make the right thing happen.

We in the Senate—and we in America—and that goes for all of us—must act like leaders. We should not take counsel of our fears. There is no course which America can take today which is without risk. We can, by timid talk here in the Senate and by refusing to move until every unknown factor is accounted for, until every last chinstrap is in place and every last button polished, lose this struggle for existence just as surely as it could be lost on the battlefield. While prudently realizing the dangers, we should also be impressed with the tremendous elements of strength on our side. We must have the faith and the confidence in ourselves to take the lead. We must then regain the initiative as soon as we are strong enough to do it.

Mr. President, this is the testing time for Europe, surely. But it is also the testing time for the United States, which will show whether we are able to lead and, thus, whether we are able to survive. Facing us is another of a long series of attempts, which have been made throughout history, either by strength or by guile, or by both, to enslave mankind. These attempts have always failed in the end. We on the other hand, are dedicated to the ideal of the free man—free to worship and free to develop himself. Those who follow this ideal have had their dark days and dangers; they have often been clumsy and lacking in foresight. But in the end, this is an ideal which has never let humanity down.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I deeply appreciate the observations of the distinguished Senator, and also the knowledge which he has of the subject. Of course, he is a member of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. LODGE. No; I am not a member of the Committee on Armed Services. I should like to be, but I am not.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator would like to be a member?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator's wide experience in the Army is sufficient background. Let me ask the Senator a question. I am asking it in all seriousness, and I am asking it constructively. Does the Senator feel that under the North Atlantic defense treaty the President can commit foot soldiers to be assigned as a part of an international army before the Congress has determined the character of the aid which the United States shall give?

Mr. LODGE. Of course he can do it.

Mr. WHERRY. Under the North Atlantic Treaty provisions?

Mr. LODGE. He can do it anyway. He can order them to go anywhere. He has that power.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator feel that he can do it under the North Atlantic defense treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The North Atlantic Treaty does not stop him.

Mr. WHERRY. So the Senator's answer is that under the North Atlantic Treaty the President does have the right to commit——

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not say that. I said that the North Atlantic defense treaty did not stop him from doing it. I do not believe that the North Atlantic defense treaty commits him to do it.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator follow up with the rest of the answer? The determination as to whether we shall or shall not send foot soldiers is another question. Leaving the merits or demerits of that question out of consideration, all I am asking now is this: Does not the Senator feel that before a commitment is made which assigns soldiers as an integrated part of a land force in Western Europe, under the North Atlantic Treaty, at least, the Congress should first determine the policy? If the Senator would agree with that, then a point which the Senator made in his speech would follow, that is, the point with respect to the size of the Army. The Senator was outlining 16 points with respect to which there was agreement.

Could we not agree on the point that before a commitment is made, under the North Atlantic Treaty, as to troops as a part of an integrated army, the President must come to the Congress for a determination of the policy?

Mr. LODGE. I hope very much that some system can be devised which will call for congressional understanding and approval of whatever is done. I am hopeful that something can be worked out. I do not believe that we ought to undertake to determine troop and plane and ship movements here in the Capitol.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with the Senator. I am not talking about tactics. I am not discussing now whether the forces to be sent should be land forces, air forces, or naval forces. All I am asking is that before any commitment is made under the North Atlantic defense treaty, the Congress should determine the policy. I think we should start from the same premise. Although I voted against the North Atlantic treaty, I am convinced that we are now absolutely bound by its provisions. We are bound to give mutual aid.

Mr. LODGE. We are bound to give it only if they do their part. We are not bound to give aid unless they do their part.

Mr. WHERRY. As I recall the answer of the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the junior Senator from Nebraska, he said that if Senators voted for that proposal we would be voting definitely to commit ourselves to give some form of aid. He stated that the thing left for determination was the kind of aid to be given. That is the one thing which he said would be left to the Congress in the event that, under section 9 of the act, an advisory board program were submitted to us. We would determine what the character of the aid should be.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that an important factor is that they must make a showing. The North Atlantic Pact deals with "effective self-help and mutual aid." The word "effective" is very important. If they fizzle out and lie down on the job, I do not think we are under obligation to do much.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree that they must produce. I think that was the burden of former President Hoover's speech. But after that is done, after the program has been talked over by the Executive, what is to be the situation? The reason I am asking the question is that the newspapers have been filled with statements with respect to commitments of certain numbers of soldiers, so many divisions, and so forth. All I am asking is this: After there has been a determination by the Advisory Board, and after negotiations are conducted by the executive department, which it has a perfect right to do, does not the Senator feel that after that step has been taken, and before the aid is given, the Congress of the United States ought to determine the character of the aid?

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator that the Congress has a responsibility with regard to this subject, and that we are held responsible by the American people. We also have a personal concern as American citizens, and we cannot ignore that or brush it to one side. I am looking for some way to reconcile that with the realities of the situation. Of course, we have a great deal of power in determining the size of the Armed Forces, through our power of appropriation, and if we know there are going to be 7 divisions in Korea, and 3 divisions here, and all we are going to have is 18 divisions, we have a very strong limitation right there.

I should like to see some procedure worked out to take care of the very legitimate and sincere anxiety which the Senator from Nebraska has, but I do not think we ought to require congressional approval as a condition precedent before we send American military personnel overseas, because that is bad for them.

Mr. WHERRY. I hoped that would not be the position of the Senator from Massachusetts, and that he would not say that, because, as I understood the debate in connection with the North Atlantic Treaty correctly—and I believe I did, because I was present when it took place—I was led to believe by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] that when the pact was ratified we had definitely committed ourselves, along with the other signatory powers, to do certain things. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that other nations have to show their inclination to act for their mutual aid. But under section 9 the advisory board could submit to us a program, let us say, calling for three divisions before a signatory power is attacked, and five divisions afterward.

What was promised over and over again by the managers of the bill on both sides of the aisle was "If you vote for this pact and Congress is favorable to this treaty, then we are definitely committed to mutual aid under all the conditions."

Mr. LODGE. Yes, but not to send troops.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the point I am making.

Mr. LODGE. We are not committed to send troops.

Mr. WHERRY. We are not committed to send troops, and Congress should determine that. Is that not true?

Mr. LODGE. We are not committed to send troops.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I have not been arguing this on the basis of any legal commitment. I have been trying to consider it from the standpoint of what is good judgment, what is common sense, and if we agree on that basis we will have no trouble with legalisms.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Do I correctly understand the Senator to say that Congress should not expressly limit the number of American divisions to be sent to this international army?

Mr. LODGE. I think Congress can limit the total number of divisions we can have in the total army. I myself would not be willing to vote on how many divisions we ought to send to Europe.

Mr. TAFT. What I suggest to the Senator is that in this European adventure we are committing these troops to a commander selected by the United Nations, not by us. General Eisenhower is not an American officer in his present capacity.

Mr. LODGE. Not by the United Nations.

Mr. TAFT. Of the North Atlantic Pact nations. It seems to me that Congress should very definitely limit by number the troops that can be committed to the command of an officer who is not an officer of the United States Army or under the Commander in Chief of the United States Army. Does not the Senator think that Congress should limit the number of the men of the American Army that may be committed to the command of such a commander?

Mr. LODGE. I think an argument can be made for that. I should like to see exactly how the provision was phrased, how it was worded. I think there is a theoretical argument for doing it. Whether it can be done practically without doing more harm than good is something I should like to study first.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest to the Senator the precedent of the United Nations where we did exactly that. The statute dealing with the United Nations provided for a special agreement defining the character and number of the Armed Forces that were to be committed to the United Nations, and that statute reads:

> The President shall not be deemed to require the authorization of the Congress to make available to the Security Council on its call in order to take action under article 42 of said Charter and pursuant to such special agreement or agreements the Armed Forces, facilities, or assistance provided for therein: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as an authorization to the President by the Congress to make available to the Security Council for such purpose Armed Forces, facilities, or assistance in addition to the forces, facilities, and assistance provided for in such special agreement or agreements.

So in the case of the United Nations, where we were committing a certain American army under certain circumstances to the control of the United Nations commander we provided that Congress itself should pass on the over-all commitment that might be made. I do not quite see why that is not a precedent, if we do the same thing in the case of the Atlantic Pact nations.

Mr. LODGE. I think, undoubtedly, there are many things about it which do constitute precedents. Of course, when we did that we were doing it more or less in the abstract, and now we have a very real situation confronting us in which it might weaken General Eisenhower's hand for bargaining purposes or something else if everything was spelled out that much in public. That I do not know.

Mr. TAFT. As the Senator pointed out, the North Atlantic treaty does not provide for any force. It provides simply, I take it, that the Council shall set up a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3 and 5.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. TAFT. So when those recommendations come in, they may well contain provisions for a specific number of troops we are expected to provide in case there should be a call for troops. There might be some such provision which might then be passed on. I maintain only that such an agreement must sooner or later be made, and that Congress ought to approve it, and it ought to be understood in advance by the European nations that it is subject to the approval of Congress. That is the only suggestion I have in that field.

Mr. LODGE. I can see what the Senator from Ohio is trying to do, and I respect it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent that I may address a question to the Senator from Ohio by reason of something which came up during the colloquy between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, regardless of the right of Congress to determine the limit of the armed forces, does not the Senator from Ohio feel that before even that is done, no commitment should be made to assign soldiers to an international army in western Europe?

Mr. TAFT. I do not think the President had authority to assign soldiers to the command of an international commander chosen by the United Nations. No, I do not think he has such authority.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I do not like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts to go back again as I did a moment ago, but I wonder if he would be so kind as to return to page 11 of his speech, the second paragraph, where he says:

> We in the Senate—and we in America—must act like leaders. We should not take counsel of our fears. There is no course which America can take today which is without risk. We can, by timid talk here in the Senate and by refusing to move until every unknown factor is accounted for, until every last chin strap is in place and every button polished, lose this struggle for existence just as surely as it could be lost on the battlefield.

I wonder if the able Senator would not believe that we can likewise lose this struggle by adopting a wrong kind of general over-all policy?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. CAPEHART. In other words, let us put some of the blame on those who might be making the over-all policy rather than on the United States Senate.

Mr. LODGE. There are many ways in which we can lose. I do not think we ought to think about that as much as we ought to be thinking about the ways we can win, as a matter of psychology.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, one last point. I think the Senator from Massachusetts has made a most valuable contribution. There is no reason why the solution of the problem cannot be worked out in an amicable way. Whether we can finally agree I do not know.

Mr. CAPEHART. I, likewise, want to congratulate the Senator from Massachusetts. I think we can very easily get together provided those who are dealing with existing policies and those who have advocated them in the past will accept the theory and the fact that we are as much interested in solving this problem as they are, and that we are just as sincere in our alternative proposals as they are in those which they continually force down our throats and the throats of the American people.

Mr. LODGE. There has got to be partnership and mutuality. I agree with that.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask my colleague a question and also perhaps preface it just a little bit.

As I listened to the colloquy between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Ohio, it seemed to me that it was based on the United Nations and the requirement that the Congress determine the number of troops the United States would furnish to a United Nations security force. I do not say that I do not think the President should not come to Congress and tell Congress what he is going to do in Europe. I heartily believe he should do so. However, I ask the Senator this question: In his opinion, is there not a great distinction between the furnishing of troops to the United Nations, for police action, or to put down an international strife in a case in which our own security might not be particularly endangered, and the sending of troops under the North Atlantic Pact with its mutual-assistance program, if we are to send them, with the approval of Congress, for our own security and safety, in the defense of our own country?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, there are shadings of distinction and differentiation. First of all, there is the question of the sending of troops for occupation purposes. No one questions the right of the President to do that. He has been sending troops for occupation to Germany and Japan ever since the end of the war, and no one has raised any question about that.

At the other extreme there is the sending of an expeditionary force, once war has been declared. Those are at the two extremes on the spectrum.

Then there is the question of the force we have been discussing today, which I agree is more than the question of an occupation force.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As a member of this body, I do not wish to place myself in the position of admitting that the establishment of a police force for the United Nations would constitute a precedent in regard to our doing what we should do for our own safety if we are in danger.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it is a precedent at all. It is somewhat analogous, but it is not a precedent, because one relates to our ability to continue our existence as a nation and the other was adopted as an abstraction. One is a generality, in connection with a theory; and the other is taken to meet a condition confronting us under specific conditions.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not important for Congress to have information in regard to such matters, in connection with our control of appropriations and the number of American troops that are sent? However, certainly we wish to be careful about saying that the President should receive the complete approval of the Congress before such action is taken.

Mr. LODGE. I think Congress should have all the information which can be given to it. However, in connection with a subject of this sort, sooner or later we get into a discussion of things which should not be discussed in public. It is too bad, but it is true because of the nature of the subject and the complexities involved.

Mr. President, I now yield the floor.

THE ISSUES WHICH CONFRONT THE NATION

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, this Nation, in the age of the airplane and the atomic weapon, can no more return to isolationism than an adult can return to childhood, regardless of how pleasant the recollection may be.

The debate now going on in Congress and throughout the country is necessary for a clarification of the issues. In a free society the people and their elected representatives must know the facts in order to make sound judgments. If they are treated as adults they will respond as such. What all men of good will who believe in a free world of free men should be striving for is to find areas of agreement upon which we can find a high degree of unity in meeting the challenge which threatens our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

Most Americans and an overwhelming majority of congressional Democrats and Republicans alike would agree that communism is a threat to our way of life and has clearly demonstrated by its actions during the past 5 years that it is a godless aggressive tyranny determined to destroy the free way of life. Previously in our history we have understood that we must hang together or be hanged separately. Free men everywhere had better understand that now, without delay.

The divisions amongst us, then, are not on the danger, which is apparent, but on the means of best combating it.

There are certain basic facts which all responsible Government officials and private citizens must keep in mind.

Under our constitutional system the present administration will control the executive branch of the Government until January, 1953. The present Eighty-second Congress will be in control of the legislative branch during the same period of time. No effective foreign or national defense policy can be formulated or executed without the cooperative effort of the President and the Congress.

The most critical period in the life of western civilization will be the years 1951 and 1952. We dare not wait until 1953, when the American people might select a different President or a different Congress, in order to compose the fundamental differences that confront us. As President Grover Cleveland pointed out, "A condition, not a theory, confronts us."

In the period since VJ-day, in 1945, Congress has provided all the defense funds the President has requested in his budget. The controversy has been over the desire of Congress to appropriate a larger amount, as in the case of the 70-group air program, than the President was willing to spend. As a member of both the Appropriations Committee and the Armed Services Committee, I am convinced that whatever the defense needs of this Nation are, the necessary legislation and appropriations will be forthcoming.

The differences between the executive and legislative branches of the Government will be not over the necessity of having an adequate defense, but over how such forces will be distributed prior to the outbreak of hostilities brought about by the aggression of the Soviet Union or its satellites.

A large majority in the Senate voted to ratify the North Atlantic treaty. I was among that number. There were some who opposed it. It was ratified by more than a two-thirds vote, as provided for under our Constitution. The vote was 82 to 13—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 8, page 9916.

Even most of those who opposed the ratification of the treaty recognize that with its approval we assumed definite obligations in the event of aggression against the other signatories, and that we must, of course, promptly meet all of those obligations without debate or delay.

In meeting our North Atlantic Treaty obligations, I do not believe that the hands of the President, as Commander in Chief, should or could be tied.

If the Senate debated, under its liberal rules of debate, the wisdom of sending armed forces to meet our treaty obligations as long as the United Nations has debated for 2½ months whether or not to name the Chinese Communists aggressors, most of Europe, at least to the English Channel and the Pyrenees, would be overrun, and we would be faced with a Soviet fait accompli.

The basic question then arises as to what extent prior to the occurrence of causa belli under the treaty should American forces be disposed on the European continent.

Here, then, is the crux of the problem, and one on which patriotic Americans may and do differ. It is here we must find an area of agreement if our foreign and military policy is not to be paralyzed.

Our European allies should realize that Americans have been disappointed and disillusioned by the fact that in the United Nations' effort to arrest aggression in Korea, after a lapse of 6 months, this Nation has supplied 90 percent of the troops furnished by United Nations members and has had 90 percent of the casualties suffered by United Nations members. In fact, our casualties alone outnumber the total armed forces supplied by all of the rest of the United Nations members combined.

This particular experience is still fresh in our minds. The United Nations activities have largely concentrated on how to word an instrument of surrender that would not make a Chinese Communist aggressor's victory seem quite so humiliating to this Nation which up to now has not lost a war. It would have been better if the other members had shown the same energy in getting land, sea, and air power to Korea to meet this first overt aggression head-on and to stop it in its tracks.

Peace we could always buy, as at Munich, by surrendering the rights of small countries until there were no such assets left. We did not and we do not need the "red tape" of the United Nations to prepare for us a surrender instrument to sign. We are seeking, not peace at any price, but peace with honor. Appeasement of aggressors as at Munich is but surrender on the installment plan. On no such basis can the moral forces of the free world be rallied.

It seems to me that we, our North Atlantic allies, and our fellow United Nations members must determine now whether or not a collective security system against aggression is desired. If such a system is desired, it must not be limited in its application by any geographic or color line. The freedom of the people of the Republics of Korea, China, or the Philippines, of Japan, or of the other Asiatic nations from Communist aggression is not less important to them than is the freedom from aggression to the Europeans. It was Lenin who made the sound observation that the road to Paris is through Peiping.

It is, of course, true that in some areas of the world aggression can be better met than in others. Indeed in some remote areas it may not be strategically possible to mobilize sufficient power to uphold international law and order against aggression, but even in those cases aggression should be labeled as such and the aggressor designated the international outlaw that he is.

Rewarding Chinese Communist aggression because it has had a measure of success to date is bowing to the doctrine of might makes right. Such an abject surrender to force will be fatal to the United Nations and make it unworthy of further support by freemen anywhere. Already the military value of the United Nations has been demonstrated as being inconsequential to meet the needs of the hour. With the self-destruction of its moral standing and leadership the United Nations would become an empty shell of a debating society with a large payroll of bureaucrats interested in preserving their jobs.

I speak more in sorrow than in anger, for I have supported the United Nations in the 5½ years I have been a Member of the United States Senate.

Our British allies must recognize that it is more essential to stop aggression than it is to temporarily hold Hong Kong.

American, French, and British businessmen must realize that it is more important to stop aggression than it is to make blood-money profits growing out of shipments to the Communist aggressor in Red China. Anything that is shipped to or from Communist China strengthens the economy of that country and makes it better able to make war against the United Nations as it is doing today in Korea. Are Great Britain, France, and India going to be as free and easy in sacrificing Hong Kong, Malaya, Indochina, or the border area of India to Red China when their turn comes as some United Nations members appear to be when the 30,000,000 non-Communist people of the Republic of Korea or the 9,000,000 free people of the Republic of China now on the Island of Formosa are the victims?

If communism is a global menace—which it is—it must be met on a global basis. If the false doctrine is sold to the free people of the world that everything must be concentrated on the defense of Europe and no risks taken in Asia, how far is the retreat expected to go? If Korea and Formosa are the sacrificial lambs to this policy, how do you rally world public opinion 6 months or a year from now to hold Japan, the Philippines, Southeast Asia, India, or Pakistan? Or is the free world willing that these also be the tokens of appeasement when the Communist timetable calls for future payments, as it inevitably will, either this year or next? Where do you draw the line?

One year ago, on January 5, 1950, in opening the debate on American far-eastern policy, I stated:

> Within the last 90 days two catastrophic events have taken place. These are the Soviet success in atomic development, as announced by the President of the United States on September 23, 1949, and the establishment of a Soviet-recognized Communist regime in China. Only in retrospect will we be able to finally determine which event will have the most far-reaching influence. Both have set off chain reactions that have not yet run their full course.
> In Europe we have had a foreign policy in which the Republicans and the Democrats have contributed to the initiation and formulation of doctrines that are understandable. In the Far East there has been no bipartisan foreign policy. The Republicans in Congress have not been consulted in the moves leading up to the bankrupt policy which now stands revealed in all its sorry detail. The administration, and it alone, has the full responsibility for the debacle which has taken place on the continent of Asia and which day by day and hour by hour is endangering the future peace of the world and the security of this country. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 96, part 1, pp. 79–98.)

This was 6 months before the invasion by North Korean Communists across the thirty-eighth parallel. Had a firm stand been taken even as late as a year ago and a line drawn in Asia as it was in Europe, it is doubtful that the Soviet Union and its satellites would have risked aggression in Korea on June 24, 1950. International communism knew that aggression against the North Atlantic countries would bring us into the conflict at a time when we still had and have a superiority in atomic weapons. However, they had reason to believe—as the result of the President's statement of January 5, 1950, that no additional aid would be given to Formosa and the subsequent speech of the Secretary of State at the National Press Club on January 12 of the same year, wherein he left Korea and Formosa outside of the American defense line—that here were two areas where the chances were reasonably good that Communist gains could be made without involving the United States or the other free nations of the world.

On April 3, 1950, the Secretary of State handed to the Korean Ambassador a note insisting, among other things, that the Korean Government take effective measures to balance the budget which, of course, would require them to proportionately decrease their defense expenditures. One week later, on April 10, in the course of my remarks of that day, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 96, part 4, on pages 4983–4987, I called to the attention of the Senate the following facts:

The Government of Korea has been constantly faced with the overt acts of aggression across the thirty-eighth parallel by Communist irregulars from north of the line. At the time I was in Korea last November (i. e., 1949) there had already been 360 violations of the thirty-eighth parallel by Communist groups from North Korea ranging in size from a squad to a battalion. Many additional violations of the border have taken place since last November, the latest being a few days ago. President Syngman Rhee recently pointed out that there had been substantial casualties on the part of the forces of the Republic of Korea, and there have been considerably greater casualties on the part of the invading forces. Needless to say in that part of the world the cold war is quite warm.

There are a number of responsible people in the Republic of Korea who believe that once the Chinese Communists have liquidated the remaining resistance by the forces of the Republic of China to their regime that they will then move both Communist troops and equipment back into Manchuria and make them available to the North Korean Communists for an invasion against the Republic of Korea.

These remarks were made on the floor of the Senate 3 months before the North Korean Communist aggressors invaded across the thirty-eighth parallel.

Again, over a month ago, on December 4, 1950, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 16049, I stated:

All of Asia hangs in the balance. If the manpower and the natural resources of Asia fall into the orbit of international communism there will exist the greatest aggregation of power the world has ever known. With its Asiatic flank fully protected, the Soviet Union will be able to concentrate its strong far eastern armed forces with those it now has in Eastern Europe and greatly offset any new planned build-up in armed forces of the Western World. Therein rests the fallacy of those who would abandon Asia and concentrate on Europe alone.

Nine years ago this week we were caught with our defenses down at Pearl Harbor. A heavy blow which precipitated us into World War II came out of the Pacific, and the invasion by an Asiatic foe of some of the Alaskan Aleutian Islands took place soon after. This was done by a nation of 80,000,000 people. A billion and a half is the population of Asia, a large part of which today is either still outside the iron curtain or not yet fully digested.

During this same debate I urged that steps be taken to immediately help equip the more than 500,000 non-Communist forces of the Republic of China on Formosa. A start on this program is now apparently under way. I hope and pray that it will not be another case of too little and too late.

If the British and our other allies will recognize the global menace and help draw the line against communism in Asia, with India, if possible, but without that nation if necessary, it is my personal opinion that an area of agreement can be found in Congress and throughout the country that will give substantial support to the steps that must be taken to build the defenses of the free world against further Communist aggression.

The President of the United States is to be commended for the tone and content of his State of the Union message of Monday, January 8, 1951, relative to foreign policy. In it he invites constructive debate, and the spirit of the message should make it possible to find an area of agreement on our foreign and military policy so that this Nation will not be paralyzed in carrying out its commitments or in meeting new challenges which may unexpectedly confront us at almost any hour of any day.

Certainly it is vital that Europe not fall into the orbit of international communism. If Europe is lost to the free world, the strategic bases and materials of Africa would be difficult to hold. The bulk of the uranium for the American atomic development comes from Africa. We would be severely handicapped without it.

Yet our European allies and friends must fully realize that they have the primary responsibility and interest in keeping outside the Communist iron curtain. Our contributions in sea and air power will be much greater than theirs. With a larger population in the nations allied with us than we possess, the bulk of the land forces to garrison Western Europe and to discourage Communist aggression should be furnished by the European partners of the North Atlantic Treaty.

If war comes, we must then do with our air, sea, and land forces what the strategic necessities require in support of our commitments. We will not let our allies down nor must they let us down.

We cannot, however, expect them to build any army that would make Europe impregnable to Communist aggression before we place an additional man or dollar on the Continent. As an alternative I suggest as the approximate basis on which we should be willing to expand the forces we now have in Europe the following formula:

For every six divisions raised and put into the field by our North Atlantic allies we will send an additional division to Europe until we have a total of 10 divisions there and they have 60. As long as peace is maintained we would rotate our divisions so that none of them would be stuck with prolonged occupation duties which tend to soften or undermine the morale of the troops thus engaged.

In the meantime we should not delay in calling up and training within the confines of the United States the full number of divisions to meet our ultimate commitments in Europe for the continental security of the United States, Alaska, Hawaii, and our occupation forces in Japan.

While our additional divisions are being equipped and are in training in this country we should continue, under the arms implementation legislation, to assist the North Atlantic signatories in equipping the divisions that they should forthwith call up and train.

In the meantime, every effort should be exerted by ourselves and our allies forthwith to bring Spain and Western Germany into the collective security system.

As a practical matter, defense must start at the line of the Elbe or as close thereto as the strategic situation will permit. In no other way could Western Germany be expected to make a full contribution to the common defense.

It is my belief that Winston Churchill has been correct in his view that the reason the Soviet armies have not yet overrun Europe is because of the American superiority in the atomic weapon. We must see to it that no effort is spared to maintain this superiority of the weapon in quality and quantity and the means of delivering it to the heartland of any aggressor. Nor will any outside agency exercise a veto over our use of this weapon when the chips are down.

Our friends as well as any potential aggressor should understand this fact. We are not going again to be subject to an aggressor's blackmail—direct or indirect.

The term "again" is used advisedly:

First. When the North Koreans invaded South Korea the United Nations called on all members to resist the aggression. A limited number offered military aid. One of the most generous offers came from the Republic of China which agreed to send 33,000 of their best troops from Formosa and have them in Korea in 5 days. This was turned down for fear it would incite the Chinese Communists to invade Korea.

Second. The hands of our commanders in Korea have been tied by restrictions against the use of our Air Force against military targets in Manchuria for fear the war might spread in the Far East.

Third. The desire of the Republic of China to raid the coast of China and supply non-Communist forces on the mainland has been restrained because it might make the Chinese Communists more difficult in their dealings with the United Nations appeasement committees.

The free people can lose their liberty if we are blackmailed into restricting our areas of strength and meeting them on unequal terms in their areas and elements of strength.

The critical period upon which we now enter will call for great sacrifice by the people of the United States and the other free people of the world. The men in the Kremlin should thoroughly understand that the free world does not intend to be on the defensive once they have thrown down the challenge.

We have, I hope, learned much in World War II and in the present Korean fighting on guerrilla tactics. We should be prepared to enlist men who love freedom in Eastern Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and in the Soviet Union itself, to strike behind the armies of the Soviet aggressor and in conjunction with our air power to make difficult the maintenance of his supply lines to supply his aggressive forces. If the Soviet Union is prepared to challenge the free world this year or next, it will be because of their determination to see to it that the free part is destroyed. Ninety years ago Abraham Lincoln pointed out that this Nation could not remain half slave and half free. In this twentieth century we may have reached the point where now the world cannot remain half slave and half free.

It was Lincoln who also said:

> Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down in honor or dishonor to the latest generation. * * * We, even we here, have the power and bear the responsibility. * * * In giving freedom to the slave we assure freedom to the free. * * * We shall nobly save or we shall meanly lose this last best hope of earth.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Would the Senator be willing to elaborate a little with relation to the situation in Europe? I have not been present throughout his speech, but I understand that the Senator would favor sending over one of our divisions for every six of their divisions. If that be correct, does it mean that the Senator has no feelings about our taking the leadership, so to speak, by sending a man like General Eisenhower to Europe in order to stimulate the undertaking and to work it out; or does the Senator think that the leadership should be left primarily with the Europeans themselves?

Mr. KNOWLAND. No; I think the selection of General Eisenhower was a desirable one. It might have been better had there been some consultation with Congress before the selection was made and perhaps after some more basic understandings had been reached with respect to the proportion of troops to be furnished. However, that is all water over the dam. It cannot now be changed. I believe there were some valid reasons for the selection of General Eisenhower. Not only is he one of the great military leaders of the world, but he has had experience in working with allied groups during World War II. It is quite possible that had a national of any of the other North Atlantic Pact countries come into the picture certain stresses and strains might have developed which will not be developed under the leadership of General Eisenhower. I think he is an outstanding man. I believe he can contribute greatly to the solution of the problems which confront us. At the same time I think it is extremely important that our friends in Europe clearly recognize that the people and the Government of the United States have no intention, in view of the conditions which face us in Korea today, of getting into a situation again where in a collective security action we furnish 90 percent of the troops and they furnish 10 percent of the troops. I am not even in favor of furnishing 50 percent of the troops. I think that Europe, which has a large manpower, has the primary responsibility of furnishing the bulk of the land forces in Western Europe at this time. I think it should be understood that we would supply a large percentage of the air and naval forces. I do not go to the extent of saying that we should supply no land forces.

I believe the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was correct when he said that there is a certain moral effect involved. I believe it should be on a definite quid pro quo basis. In other words, there ought to be an incentive plan, if I may use the term. It should be understood that if we provide one division they will provide six divisions. Finally it should be understood that we are not going to place in Europe a number of divisions which could not be withdrawn, in case of an emergency situation, unless the European countries have demonstrated that they are willing to carry their full share of the load.

If I may elaborate briefly, I think the situation today requires Western Germany to be brought into the defense picture. I believe it requires Spain to be brought into the defense picture. If the countries of Europe do not know that they are facing the overwhelming force of the Soviet Union, and if they carry their bickerings to the extent of not permitting the Germans or the Spanish to come into the defense plan, I do not think they are taking a very realistic view of the situation which confronts the world today.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Would the Senator care to elaborate on his remarks about removing the shackles from Chiang Kai-shek, so to speak, in order that he could operate at least as a diverting force against the Chinese Communist armies?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I shall be glad to comment on that point. I was in Formosa a year ago, in November 1949 and I was there again last November. I talked to a great many competent observers, both American and others, and there is no question about the fact that the morale of the Chinese forces on Formosa and the morale of the Chinese people on Formosa have greatly increased in the intervening 12-month period. Because of the security situation I am not at liberty to go into specific figures, but I can say to the Senator from Ohio that there are more than 500,000 non-Communist troops of the Republic of China on Formosa. Of these troops I should say at least half are first-class troops. The others are in training, or in what might be called the militia, which would be helpful in the defense of the island, perhaps, but not effective as a commando force. The troops have very able leadership in General Sun Li-jen, who is a graduate of Virginia Military Institute. I am satisfied that the Chinese would be prepared and would be anxious, as a matter of fact, to have the restrictions of neutrality removed so that they could resume their commando raids on the coast of China. That is what they were doing prior to the 26th day of June.

In addition to creating a diversion, which I believe would cause the Chinese Communists to begin pulling troops out of Korea, rather than concentrating them there in order to try to throw us into the sea if they can, they would have to pull some of their best divisions out of Korea in order to protect their coast against the commando-type raids.

As important as the 500,000 Chinese Nationalist troops are what I term the approximately 1,000,000 guerrillas, who are operating behind the lines of the Chinese Communists on the mainland of China. A coordinated effort on the part of the air force of the Republic of China and its navy—and perhaps with the aid of some additional equipment from us—could resupply with arms, ammunition, and food these guerrilla elements consisting of approximately 1,000,000 men. I think they could create so many disturbances behind the lines of the Chinese Communists that the Communists would not dare concentrate their best armies in Korea for the purpose of trying to throw our troops into the sea.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to conclude with my thought on this point. Here we have a situation in which over half a million Chinese Communist troops have crossed the international frontier of the Yalu River, have crossed the thirty-eighth parallel, and are trying to destroy the American Eighth Army and the UN forces in Korea. Yet we restrain the Republic of China from carrying on an operation which would relieve the pressure against our hard-pressed troops.

It is even worse than that. Under the United Nations directive our commanders over there are restrained from attacking military targets—and I am not talking about general-area bombing—in Manchuria, such as depots, ammunition dumps, arsenals, railroad marshaling yards, and troop-concentration points. Therefore the Chinese Communist aggressor has all the cards in his hand. He has a line of communication coming down from Manchuria by which he is sending literally hundreds of tanks into Korea for the purpose of destroying the American Eighth Army and the United Nations forces in Korea. Yet our commanders are restrained from even chasing an aggressive airplane north of the Yalu River. In other words, when our planes get to the Yalu River there is an off-limits sign before them. That simply does not make sense to me.

The third point is that for a period of more than a year, as the able Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], has so ably pointed out in his committee hearings, there has been a constant supplying by ship of the Communist aggressors in Red China from Hong Kong and from other places in the world—and I regretfully say from the United States as well, which has enabled them to build their war machine and to build the economy upon which their war machine rests. It simply does not make sense to me that we should not free the navy of the Republic of China, which for a small navy was doing a very effective job of blockading before our neutrality policy was put into effect, and on top of it augmenting it with the American Navy, to see to it that not a single ship of any size or character would get in or out of a Communist port, whether it flew the American, British, or any other flag. I believe it is time that we stopped this trade in blood money in supplying the people who today are destroying American troops.

If we carried out that type of policy, I believe we would bring so many pressures upon the Communist regime in China that they could not devote all their time and energy to being aggressors in Korea.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I was curious to know whether we have reasonably accurate information on the activities of the guerrillas within China.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; I think we have substantially accurate information on the activities of the guerrillas.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Are they operating spontaneously, or are they operating under the direction of Chiang Kai-shek or someone representing him?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have some material in my office which I think the Senator might be interested in reading, but I can say this, very briefly: The guerrillas are not all of one type.

First, there were certain guerrilla forces which the Nationalist Government of the Republic of China deliberately left on the mainland when they were forced to retreat from the continent.

Secondly, there are a large number of forces which were cut off in some of the battles, and went up into the mountains and developed support from local populations. They generally take their leadership from the island of Formosa, as does the first group.

In addition, there were certain other forces. When the opportunists, the band-wagon jumpers, and the traitors among some of the Chinese generals deserted to the Chinese Communist forces, they marched their armies over with them, without telling the soldiers where they were going. When the soldiers found out about it, they mutinied. The Communists themselves have admitted that they have had several serious mutinies. Those soldiers took to the hills. They generally look to the leadership in Formosa.

Furthermore, there are less well-organized bands of farmers oppressed by tax payments, and of students who have in the past welcomed communism and who now see how oppressive it is.

There are certain people who have never had close ties with Chiang Kai-shek and the Republic of China. I refer to some of the Mongols and some of the others who are in the far interior of China, who are more or less operating on their own. But all of them furnish a substantial body which could be used to create great disturbances behind Communist lines.

The Senator should know—though some claims are made to the contrary—that most of this guerrilla activity is south of the Yangtze River—certainly south of Manchuria—because in those areas where the Chinese Communists have had their power established the longest period of time they have gradually been able to eliminate most of the dissident elements; but they have not yet had time to digest their conquests in south China, and as a result we find the bulk of the incipient rebellion in that area of the country.

Mr. MILLIKIN. May I ask the distinguished Senator whether there is any authentic history of important accomplishments by those guerrillas?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes. As a matter of fact, today they hold considerable areas. A little earlier mention was made of islands of resistance. I think we violate no security at this point when we say that they have established islands of resistance behind the Communist lines in south and central China.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. We have read a great deal in the newspapers to the effect that when the Communist army is finished with Korea—or perhaps does not finish with Korea—it is likely to move down into Indochina to help the Communists in Indochina and on down the peninsula. Does not the Senator feel that if Chiang Kai-shek were released, there would be a substantial barrier in the way of such future aggression?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the Senator from Ohio has put his finger on a very vital point. So long as the Chinese Communist forces are kept involved with the forces of the Republic of China, guerrilla or regular forces, and while they have a considerable number of their people involved with the United States in Korea, they are not in a position to concentrate their whole force for an invasion of southeast Asia. But once they liquidate all of Korea, and once they have had an opportunity to move the very well-trained and well-disciplined Communist forces, particularly the Fourth Army under General Lin-piao, out of Korea and leave to the North Korean Communists the job of liquidating all non-Communists in Korea, which will be the inevitable result if they get control of the whole peninsula, they will move those highly trained, disciplined Chinese forces down to guard their coast line, and we may even miss the opportunity of creating a diversion. The Chinese Nationalist forces, together with their guerrillas, cannot only help us by diverting the concentration of power against us in Korea, but in addition they can prevent the concentration of power against southeast Asia.

We are faced with a very practical problem. If we continue to restrain the forces of the Republic of China, we are going to miss the boat entirely. It is going to be another case of too little and too late. Perhaps the next 90 days will be the most crucial days in terms of ability to accomplish anything in that area. Once we permit the Chinese Communists, without any interference from the non-Communist Chinese on Formosa and within the country, to go down and take all of southeast Asia, they will take the bread basket of Asia—I should say the rice basket of Asia. Food is a powerful weapon. The Chinese Communists, being ruthless, as Communists are all over the world, will use the weapon of food, along with their military power, to subjugate the rest of Asia.

They have already started through Tibet. If they get Tibet and southeast Asia, it is my personal opinion—no one can document it as yet—that the people of India, who have been obstructing action by the United Nations in declaring Red China an aggressor, and who have offered not a single soldier, airplane, or ship in defense of the free world and in defense of the Republic of Korea against aggressors, will be looking to the rest of the world for some help against the aggression which will inevitably be leveled against them. I think it may be very difficult to encourage and instill with enthusiasm the free people of the world to come to the aid of India at that late date, when the people of India have obstructed, by every means at their disposal, the resistance by the free people of the world to the Communist aggression.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I can see why we did not accept Chinese Nationalist aid so long as we were fighting the North Koreans. I can see why it was not wise to incite the Chinese Communists into war with us. But now that we are in such a war, now that they are killing American boys, now that they are threatening the security of the entire Eighth Army, I cannot understand the foreign policy or the military policy which refuses to loose Chiang Kai-shek from the restraints which we alone have imposed on him, in order to enable him to join the war against the Chinese Communists.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator that I do not understand it either.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an article entitled "United States Policy: To Bar Red China in UN and Hold Out In Korea," written by David Lawrence, and published in the New York Herald Tribune of January 11.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES POLICY: TO BAR RED CHINA IN UNITED NATIONS AND HOLD OUT IN KOREA

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, January 10.—The United States Government has determined definitely that admission of Red China to the United Nations is not only out of the question so far as American approval is concerned, but that such action would be to reward aggression.

This basic policy is buttressed also by a determination not to withdraw our troops from Korea, but to fight it out there as long as the UN forces are capable of resistance.

What this means is that the United States considers the Far East to be a definite battleground not only for the prestige of the UN, but also for the future morale of all the non-Communist elements within China, Japan, and the Philippines.

To withdraw voluntarily from Korea is regarded by the American Government as virtually tantamount to abandoning the security of Japan and as an invitation to an attack on Japan and perhaps on Alaska.

MAC ARTHUR'S ATTITUDE

The pros and cons of staying in Korea or withdrawing have been debated here for a long time. The decision is to stay and to inflict as much punishment as possible on the Communist forces. Rumors that General MacArthur wanted to withdraw not only are without foundation, but his attitude is the exact opposite—he wants more troops to assist in holding Korea.

If the Chinese Communists are to be checkmated by any force, it will be by counter-revolutionaries who are expected to be welded together, not necessarily under the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek or his lieutenants. The American program is to fight it out in Korea and to afford time for the non-Communist forces in Asia to consolidate.

The intimations from London that the ministers of the British Commonwealth are actually considering a program which would recommend recognition of Communist China and admission to the United Nations produced the comment here that this can hardly be a unanimous attitude and that the viewpoint of countries like India has been well known for some time.

DANGER TO UN

While it is too extreme a statement to say that the UN will die if the dissension within its councils continues on such a matter as admitting Red China, the fact is that the prestige of the international organization will fade away and attention will then have to be focused on the attitude of individual member governments and groups.

The United States at the moment is engaged in a canvass of all free nations to obtain their approval for the branding of Communist China as an aggressor. The exchanges are secret now, but some day they will be published. The American people then will have an opportunity to judge for themselves which countries stood up and were willing to brand the aggressor and which countries flirted with the idea of appeasing the enemy. The list may determine America's attitude toward such nations for generations to come.

It can be stated positively that the United States Government has for some time now been in touch, directly and indirectly, with the Communist authorities and has come to the conclusion that there is no sincerity of purpose in Peking and that to concede anything now would only whet the appetite of the Red Chinese leaders for more concessions.

RESPONSIBILITY OF UNITED STATES

The truth is the policy of the United States is growing firmer every day even as the policy of some other governments is growing weaker. The United States recognizes that it must bear the largest responsibility for what is happening in the Pacific because it cannot permit encroachments which, if unchecked at the start, could lead perhaps to the seizure of Alaska. European nations need have no fear that America considers the Far East a primary theater. The Far East will remain a secondary area and Europe will always be the first consideration. American naval and air forces, however, will operate in the Pacific and a land force big enough to carry on a holding operation there will be continued. The European countries are expected to furnish the bulk of the land forces for the European front, supplemented by American land forces.

American policy is clear and thoroughly understood by those who must express it to other governments. The time is not yet ripe for a public avowal of the American viewpoints. This waits on the evolution of the military situation in Korea and the responses to our note to member governments seeking support for the UN move to brand Red China as the aggressor.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. How does the Senator, or how does the administration, or how does anyone else figure that we can win against the Chinese Communists if we are to be able to fight them only in Southern Korea? How can we ever possibly defeat them? If we are to be confined to an area about 100 miles square, how are we ever going to defeat them? What is the plan for winning the so-called Korean War?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am a member of the Committee on Armed Services. I cannot go into a detailed discussion of the strategy which may have been revealed to the committee. However, I think the principal situation with which we are now faced is that we must recognize that neither we nor the rest of the free world have the defensive forces properly to meet the challenge of the Soviet world. The responsibility for that condition rests on many people, including the Executive, the Congress, and the general public. The administration must take a large share of the responsibility, because aggression was not something which came up overnight. We were put on notice, as long ago as the time when the President came to a joint session of Congress and requested the Greek-Turkish aid program, that international communism was seeking soft spots. At the time of the Berlin blockade it was indicated that they were testing us out to see whether they could seize a free area without too much resistance.

The President of the United States had ample warning from his Air Policy Board that with the critical situation in the world, with the possibility of our opponents developing an atomic stockpile, the minimum number of airplanes we should have was 70 groups. Yet what happened? The President insisted that only 48 groups be provided. Even when the Congress of the United States in 1949 provided for 52 groups the President refused to use the funds, and kept the force at 48 groups. So I will say to the Senator that it may be a holding operation in Korea and in other areas of the world until we can start operating from strength rather than from weakness.

Mr. CAPEHART. Holding against whom? We have an army there in a small area, with no possible chance of that army winning so long as they are confined to fight within a 100-mile area. Why do we permit American boys to remain there and fight and be killed when there is no possibility of their winning?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am not authorized to speak, nor could I speak, for the administration, but I would say that some other factors are involved in this situation which fit into the holding idea I have just mentioned to the Senate. In the first place, the Republic of Korea was created under the auspices of the United Nations. We have a considerable responsibility for the maintenance of the Republic of Korea because we consented to the division of the country at the thirty-eighth parallel. That was an unnatural division. Two-thirds of the people lived in the free part of Korea and one-third lived in the Communist part of Korea.

The United Nations held in Korea a full and free election. It was testified to be such by the UN Commissioners. As a result, if at this point the United States and the United Nations should pull out of Korea, not only would there be the greatest blood bath in that area the world has ever seen, and sacrifice of the non-Communist believers in democracy who are in Korea to a ruthless extermination by the Communists, but it would have a tremendous psychological impact upon the people of Japan, upon the people of Formosa, upon the people of the Philippines, of India, and, I believe, upon the people all around that periphery, because they would say that "if when pressure comes the United States and the United Nations runs out and abandons us and leaves us to the tender mercies of the Communists, we had better make our deal with the Kremlin now." I do not think that the free world should get the reputation of running out on their friends while the Communist world gets the reputation of standing by theirs, as Stalin has stood by Mao Tse Tung and as Mao Tse Tung has stood by the Korean Communists.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator's argument does not ring well with me, because it is the free world, England and the United Nations, which is denying our Army or the United Nations army its right to flank the Communist army and to bomb China and to battle. The Senator suggests that the United Nations are saying that our boys should remain in Korea and be killed like sitting ducks for God knows how long, waiting for somebody to do what? To make up their minds that we are going to bomb China. To make up their minds that we are going to send Chiang Kai-shek into battle? To make up their minds that we are going to do what? How long are we going to let our American boys stay there and be killed? Shall it be 10 more days, 10 months, or 10 years? Everyone knows that an army cannot possibly win if it is forced to fight 300,000,000 Chinese in an area of 100 square miles, and when it cannot move up to attack beyond that limited area.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say to the Senator from Indiana that he is no more critical about this policy which has tied our hands than I have been.

Mr. CAPEHART. I know that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have spoken frequently on the subject. When I came back from Korea I spoke on the subject. I talked with some of our pilots there. They told me that they saw Communist planes rise up from the airfields north of the Yalu River, fire on them, and that when our planes went out to chase them, they returned to the sanctuary behind the Yalu, and our men were not permitted to chase them there. The Senator does not have to sell me on the importance of doing something affirmative.

But I say that, even if in the borders of other members of the United Nations there are a number of people who want a far eastern Munich—and I think there are a number of them in the United Nations today who are trying to work out a far eastern Munich—I believe that that would be a futile policy. I think that it would lead to a billion and a quarter people of Asia coming into the Communist orbit, and if a billion and a quarter people come into the Communist orbit, I believe the chances of even restraining communism in Western Europe are almost nil. In my opinion, we have waited 2½ months too long to declare Communist China an aggressor. I think that should be done with or without the United Nations.

I have never favored sending a United Nations land army into Manchuria or into China. I have never favored sending an American Army into Manchuria or into China. I think that would be a futile policy. It would be the same mistake that Napoleon made in Russia, and that others have made in invasions of Russia. I would not operate in an area of terrain in which the enemy is superior to us by 10 to 1. I would operate in areas where we are superior to them by many times that number to one. I would exercise the use of a naval blockade. We have the greatest Navy in the world today and we can bring more of our ships out of "mothballs." We can put a tight blockade on the coast of China. I would operate with air power to strike at the military targets that are in Manchuria, and serve notice on the Chinese Communists that so long as they have a single soldier as an invader and aggressor in Korea, we will continue to bomb these military targets. I think if we use a little intestinal fortitude rather than yielding to blackmail, we will be less likely to be pushed off the globe.

Mr. CAPEHART. I am fully aware that the Senator has taken the same position that I have taken and that many others have taken. I was not questioning him on the ground that he was not taking that position. I am fully aware of the fact that the Senator's answer to me was the answer that others gave to the Senator. But the fact still remains that there is not a living military man who will say that we can win against the Chinese if we are going to be forced to fight within a 100-square-mile area in southern Korea. It cannot be done. It never will be done. Yet the United Nations is denying, and our own Government is denying our military men the right to protect their own lives.

Delegates to the United Nations sit in New York, in a new building, in plush seats, trying to make up their minds as to whether we will be permitted to go into China and defend our Army in Korea. It is ridiculous, it is silly. It is a blight on the intelligence of the United States Government and the United Nations. They ought to make up their minds. I say we ought to get our Army out of Korea or we ought to be given permission to go into China proper and fight the enemy with every weapon we have at our command. If we do not do it pretty soon, I cannot see how we are going to keep faith with the American boys who are giving their lives in Korea.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I do not believe we can fight a big war or a little war—sometimes called a police action—with one or both hands tied behind our backs. I think that is precisely what we are asking our commanders to do in that area of the world.

Mr. CAPEHART. Of course it is.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have talked with innumerable GI's in Korea, junior officers as well as senior officers, airmen, Navy men, and land forces, and I do not think that what is happening makes sense to them any more than it does to the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from California.

Mr. CAPEHART. Within the last 48 hours the British Foreign Minister said that his country would not stand for any interference by the Chinese Communists, at the very time when the Chinese Communist Army was killing American boys and possibly British boys, because the British boys are fighting now in South Korea. What sort of statesmanship encourages that? Is it any wonder that many of us have no confidence in the leadership of the United States, the leadership of our own Government, and the leadership of the British Government?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Although I cannot say that I had the same opportunity of discussing matters with the British Commonwealth contingent which is in Korea that I had in discussions with American soldiers there, yet knowing something of the British soldier, and having seen in World War II the fine soldier that he is, I have no doubt in my own mind that if a Gallup poll were conducted among the British soldiers now in Korea, we would find that they would take, as the Senator has said, the same dim view of the collaborating activities that many of us have taken in connection with the activities of the members of the United Nations, since it was organized in my State of California, in the city of San Francisco.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Assuming that the Nationalist Chinese were permitted to leave Formosa and to go on to the mainland of China, what would necessarily have to be our contribution to that effort in the way of munitions, supplies, and transport; and after they got into the mainland of China what would be our further obligations?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say that they need additional supplies. Again I would question the wisdom of stating on the floor of the Senate exactly what I think would be needed in that connection, because they threw open to me complete information about their training schools, shipping, and other matters, and I cannot betray that confidence. I can say to the Senator from Colorado that they need certain items to supply their forces. In my judgment—and, in addition, I have talked about this matter with some responsible Americans—the things the Nationalist Chinese need are not, for the most part, competitive with the equipment the western European armies most urgently need. I do not think that by giving the limited amount of equipment which is needed in Formosa we would in any sense be jeopardizing the arms-implementation program in Europe, because the types of equipment needed by the Nationalist Chinese are more in the nature, let us say, of small arms and ammunition, perhaps some amphibious craft, and items of that kind, which I do not think constitute the main requirements in connection with the arms-implementation program in Europe.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Would that help have to come from us?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think it would.

Mr. MILLIKIN. How about transports?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think we have a considerable surplus of landing craft which we could make available to them. They have the navy which could operate them. They would need some airplanes. I shall not detail the types now; but I would say it is no secret, and I betray no confidence when I say it, that today the Chinese Nationalist forces have far more competent pilots than they have planes to be flown. With some help—as we are giving help to Indochina and to Europe—I think they would get along very well.

Mr. MILLIKIN. After the Nationalist Chinese landed on the mainland, what would be our further commitment?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Probably that would depend considerably upon the nature of their operations. I would not feel qualified to answer the question in detail, because I have always felt that such aid should not be given unless we had there a man who would serve in the way that General Van Fleet served in Greece. Time after time I have offered the suggestion that a man of the caliber of General Wedemeyer, who thoroughly knows the country and knows what is feasible and what is not feasible, should be sent there. I would not think that at the beginning, at least, they would be likely to do more than make commando-type raids on the coast of China, and perhaps regain some of the southernmost provinces of that country, so as to drive a wedge between the Ho Chi-minh forces operating in Indochina and the forces of Mao Tse-tung, operating in China. If a wedge could be driven between them, that would certainly greatly improve the situation in southeastern Asia.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Would there be any moral commitment on our part to support such Nationalist Chinese forces, once they got there, with American troops or American-manned airplanes or other equipment?

Mr. KNOWLAND. No. The Nationalist forces do not need American manpower. All their officials with whom I have talked—and I have talked with practically all of them—state that they do not need American manpower. They do need equipment.

In the second place, I do not think it would be nesessary for American Air Force pilots to operate in the civil war which would be involved on the mainland of China, although I believe there would be a need for military pilots to strike at targets in Manchuria. However, I would say we would not use our Air Force as an air force in support of the Nationalist Chinese armies in southern China.

On the other hand, I would say there are a large number of Americans and British and men of other nationalities—I have talked with a great many of them personally—who, in my judgment, would be glad to volunteer, as in the case of General Chennault, who had his Flying Tigers over there prior to our becoming involved with the Japanese—men who would be glad to strike a blow for freedom in that area of the world, and men who have had air experience. However, that would not be the United States Air Force per se.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Is there any doubt that once we embarked, on our part, upon the steps the Senator has advocated, we would be morally obligated then to underwrite the venture?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say to the Senator that is a difficult question to answer. I do not think we would be morally bound to underwrite the venture. However, I would say that with the unsettled condition of the world, where the Communists are poised perhaps to take over Western Europe, in the over-all world strategy it is extremely important that communism not be able to concentrate all its power for the purpose of overwhelming Europe. I think they will not be likely to concentrate that power so long as they have a far eastern flank which is exposed; and I should like to keep that flank exposed.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am not arguing the wisdom of such a course.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I understand.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Neither am I arguing as to what should be the strategy. I am trying to ascertain where we would come out, once we embarked upon such a course. In that event, what would we have to do? What would be our obligations, particularly our moral obligations and commitments, once such a step were taken? Must we follow it up, in good honor, with our military forces, to salvage it if it runs into disaster?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think not. However, in the world situation existing today, I think we should be free to exercise our own strategic judgment.

Mr. MILLIKIN. That is what I wanted to get at. Would we be completely free at all times to exercise our own choice as to going in or staying out?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think we would be. I would make it very clear that it would be on that basis that the aid would be given.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I have been very much interested in the Senator's remarks. I happen to agree with him in regard to many of the positions he takes in relation to the Orient. I should like to ask him about the specific situation in Korea, and I should like to obtain his views on that subject, if he cares to express them at this time.

I wonder whether the Senator agrees that, regardless of how it is done, the question of Formosa is going to have to be resolved within a comparatively short time. In other words, it seems that as soon as the Korean situation has been settled, the Chinese Reds will then inevitably point one of their next actions toward the reduction of the Island of Formosa. So, getting down to reality, whether Chiang Kai-shek or the Chinese Nationalists move, or whether they merely remain passive in Formosa, the question of Formosa and of an assault upon it in conflict with Nationalist China, will arise almost inevitably in the future.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I agree with the Senator, whether they remain passive or whether they move, that in the not-too-distant future the Formosa situation is going to be clearly before us. Of course, no one has a crystal ball enabling him to know what the next move of the Chinese Communists will be, if they should be able to liquidate the Korean situation. I think they will move in one of two places; they will either move on southeast Asia or on Formosa. I think from their point of view it is an easier move for them to make against southeast Asia, because there they can transport their land armies with no salt-water barrier. There are 100 miles of salt-water between the Island of Formosa and the mainland of China, and to surmount that obstacle represents quite an undertaking for a nation which is not a naval power; and Red China is not a naval power. Therefore, while I think it is entirely possible that the order of priority may be altered slightly until they can take over Indochina and the rest of southeast Asia, I think that ultimately and in the not-too-distant future they will try to take Formosa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. But I call to the attention of the Senator the fact of which he is well aware, I am sure, that there is more than one method of crossing 100 miles of salt water, and that ships alone do not constitute the only method.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I saw in the press today, as I recall the rather significant statement, that 40 airborne Communist groups of Communist Russia are poised at various points in Manchuria and in southern Siberia, if not clear down in China proper at various places. I suggest that modern warfare has devised the air-transport assault, which, if in sufficient size and sufficiently manned, may eliminate the necessity of ships to go across the water in the original phases of the assault.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I quite agree with the Senator from Iowa, and I was making my statement based on the premise that the Soviet Union, as the Soviet Union, did not itself want to become involved in an assault on the island. I think that in due time they may have sufficient Chinese pilots and planes and soldiers equipped for an airborne operation, so that they could move by air. Of course, if the Soviet Union comes in and supplies their navy and their air force and their troops to help in the assault, there is no question that the problem of the Formosans and of the Chinese Republic in defending their island will become greatly complicated.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. If the Senator will yield once more, I want to say that among other statements of the Senator's and other positions he has taken, with which I agree, the incomprehensible position which the State Department of this country has taken in forbidding our American troops, fighting in Korea, to use air power in a strategic way, by going into the enemy country and cutting off his source of supply, happens to be one of the premises of the Senator from California with which I wholeheartedly agree.

Mr. KNOWLAND. If the Senator will permit, I should like to ask him at that point whether he does not agree with me that the policy which has been followed by the United Nations and the Government of the United States, in tying the hands of the commanders so that they could not properly use strategic air power, has not only had an adverse repercussion on the fighting in Korea, but has also tended to destroy the confidence of Europeans in the ability of American air power to defend them against aggression from Russia; so that it has had a chain-reaction effect which is unfair to air power? I am not one of those who believe that it is possible to win a war with air power alone. I think it is necessary to have balanced forces. But I also believe that in the very nature of things, Europeans are counting, and have the right to count, and in my judgment still should count on American air power and the job it is able to do; but tying the hands of the air power in Korea has tended to undermine confidence in that arm of American power.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from California that the vacillation and refusal of nations of power and authority in the world, who hope to be free, together with their refusal realistically and honestly to approach and admit the facts of aggression, have shaken the United Nations more than any other action since its creation. I think time is running out. I think time is running out on the question of creating a diversion south of the Yangtse River by aiding the Chinese Nationalists. I join the Senator in saying that no American troops should be sent there, but I think time is running out.

The great fear I have in my mind is that it has been personalities in the administrative and diplomatic control of this situation within our own country which have led us down this road, rather than any shortcomings in military judgment or military planning, which otherwise might have brought us closer to victory.

Mr. KNOWLAND. In other words, there has been more interest in saving face than in saving freedom.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think diplomacy has stepped into a field of action wherein the military judgment and military authority should have been preeminent. I hope that this country will change the policies of its leadership before we are brought completely to the precipice of disaster internationally.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I was listening last night to a report to the people of Canada from the United Nations, over one of the Canadian broadcasting stations, in the course of which the commentator stated that, while Canada would, of course, go along with the United States in its proposal to declare the Chinese Reds aggressors in Korea, Canada would not go along very enthusiastically, and that the reception given the American proposal by the other countries varied all the way from lukewarm to ice cold. It becomes apparent that we do not have in the United Nations the strength to declare the Chinese Reds aggressors in North Korea, and that, so long as we continue to fight in North Korea, we shall have to fight, as the Senator from California said, with one hand tied behind our back.

What solution does the Senator from California have for extricating ourselves from the unhappy situation into which we have been precipitated through United Nations action? It was, indeed, action of which I think most of the American people approved at the time it was taken. The United Nations could not wait until daylight to declare the North Koreans aggressors; but, when Chinese Reds do the same thing, it is impossible to get a vote to declare them aggressors. How would the Senator from California extricate our troops from the position they are in? Should we merely get out of Korea, and stay out, and say we are not going to embark on any more United Nations ventures; or what should we do?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I say to the Senator from Vermont that, in the first place, I think this country should take a very strong stand, as I believe we are now doing. I would say to the Senator, if he will let me complete the answer to his question, I would take a very strong stand in pointing out to the other members of the United Nations the grave danger which faces them when they themselves may, sooner than they think, have to rely on that organization for collective security in the event of Soviet aggression.

I commend the State Department and the Government of the United States for forcefully, within recent times, bringing home to the other members of the United Nations the fact that the chips are now down. If the United Nations is not prepared to assume its place of moral leadership in stopping aggression now, the whole United Nations organization may be destroyed. That is No. 1.

Then, in my judgment, we should very realistically talk to our British friends and point out to them that the position they are taking today is a dog-in-the-manger position, because they have no intention of abandoning Hong Kong or Malaya or the other areas in which they have an interest, and they are getting themselves into a very untenable position if they think that by throwing Korea and Formosa to the wolves they can arouse world public opinion 6 months from now to stand with them at Hong Kong and Malaya. I would spell it out in language which a 10-year-old child could understand. I think they are under some misconception even yet on that subject.

Mr. AIKEN. Many persons fail to see by what right England endeavors to hold Hong Kong at this time. But assuming that any United Nations act fails, then I understand the Senator from California to say that he would act unilaterally from then on, so far as the Asiatic problem is concerned.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say to the Senator from Vermont that, of course, I think we have to depend on our responsible commanders. General MacArthur is over there, and we have an able Eighth Army commander. I do not know whether from hour to hour and from day to day it may be their judgment that it involves too great a sacrifice on our part to hold some area in Korea which might prevent a large population of non-Communists being sacrificed to Communist liquidation. It may not be possible to hold it, or it may be possible to do so. If it can be held in conjunction with our naval power and our air power, without putting additional forces into Korea, there are some reasons for doing that. But that is a strategic decision which will have to be determined.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator probably refers to the Pusan beachhead.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That might be as large a beachhead as could strategically be held or it might be larger or smaller.

Mr. AIKEN. It would be held by United Nations forces.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes. The British, as I understand, have committed themselves to stay in Korea with us, and I think the other forces of the United Nations, small as they are, are also committed to do that.

The second thing is that I think the time is rapidly coming when we cannot afford to take further casualties in Korea, by reason of the fact that the Chinese are resupplying, reenforcing, and bringing down tanks, guns, and planes from Manchuria to attack our forces. The time is rapidly coming, and I think it is long past due, when we cannot await the palaverings of the United Nations in determining whether China is an aggressor in Korea. She obviously is an aggressor, and in that case I think we should strike unilaterally at the military target in Manchuria from which the supplies are coming.

The next thing, in answer to the Senator's question, is that I have talked with many persons, and I do not know of a single American military, naval, or air commander in the Far East or elsewhere who does not believe that the loss of Formosa into unfriendly hands will jeopardize the entire defense position in the Far East and drive a wedge in the defense line which runs from Japan to Okinawa to the Philippines. They do not advocate that we even ask bases on it, because we have bases elsewhere. The loss of Formosa would ultimately lead to the fall of Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines. If that happens, we shall have to move back to the Pacific Coast States of Oregon, Washington, and California. I do not believe the American people want their defenses moved back to that area in the present unsettled world condition.

So I say, in specific answer to the Senator, that, regardless of what happens in Korea, I think we must make every effort to hold Japan, to permit Japan to rearm so she can help to defend herself and not be a sitting duck for Communist aggression, because, as the Senator from Massachusetts pointed out, if the Communists get the 80,000,000 people of Japan and the industrial resources of Japan, it is only second to getting the Ruhr, so far as the war-making potential is concerned.

In order to be sure that we hold Japan and Okinawa, I think it is necessary that our friends hold the island of Formosa. Unless the island of Formosa is held by our friends there is doubt the Philippines can be held. The Philippine Republic and Australia are the southernmost anchors of our defense line. So I think we must take a stand, and take whatever risks are involved in doing so.

Mr. AIKEN. I think the Senator is entirely correct in his position on the military importance of Formosa. It might also apply to the maintenance of a beachhead in South Korea. I think he is also correct in saying that the time is running out when action can be taken by the United Nations, if it has not already run out. But what I was hoping to have some Senator indicate is what we shall do if the United Nations continues to debate, as it has, week after week, playing directly into the hands of the opposition by its delaying tactics.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I thought I had answered the Senator's question. I certainly did not mean to evade or avoid it.

Mr. AIKEN. How can we force action? How much time do we have before we should do something?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I said that I thought we should notify the United Nations we would wait only two more days and give the Chinese Communist regime 48 hours to start reversing their movement and getting out of Korea. We should notify them that if they did not do that, we would untie the hands of our commanders, that we would permit strategic bombing of military concentrations in Manchuria, that we would blockade the China coast, and not permit anything to get in or out that could be of possible military value, that we would free the hands of the Republic of China and encourage the activities of the guerrillas. I thought that 48 hours should have been given a month ago.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator see any future for the United Nations as an agency to maintain peace in the world?

Mr. KNOWLAND. No. I referred to that in my remarks earlier.

Mr. AIKEN. I was not in the Chamber at that time.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I agree with the Senator that the United Nations had the overwhelming support of the people of the United States and of the free world when, because they recognized that unless aggression were stopped in its tracks, there was no limit, and no way of telling where it would finally end, they took action 2 days after the 24th of June.

Mr. AIKEN. In regard to North Korea?

Mr. KNOWLAND. In regard to North Korea. Two and a half months have passed since the Chinese Communists invaded Korea against the resolutions of the United Nations, and the United Nations are still filibustering and debating and palavering over whether or not this is aggression.

As I pointed out in my speech, more in sorrow than in anger, because I have supported the United Nations, I believe that if they follow this policy of appeasement, the United Nations will be destroyed, it will lose the moral leadership which it had an opportunity to exercise, and will become merely an organization with a large payroll of bureaucrats, the United States paying roughly 40 percent of the funds. I do not believe the people of the United States or the people of the free world will have any interest in supporting that type of bureaucracy, which could not rise to either military leadership in an hour of crisis, or rise to the moral leadership of the world, which the people had a right to expect. If they do not do what was expected, they are not entitled to the support of free men anywhere.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator believe that the fear of the loss of commerce and trade is influencing some of the members of the United Nations to be very reluctant to declare Communist China an aggressor, or is it military fear?

Mr. KNOWLAND. No; to be fair, I think it is both. I think it is fear of the loss of trade by Hong Kong, Malaya, and Singapore, and fear that perhaps it might encourage the Chinese Communists to start moving in their direction. However, I point out to them again that if they destroy the concept that aggression by large aggressors is just as much aggression as aggression by small aggressors, and that if they subscribe to the doctrine of might makes right, it is as certain that their days are numbered as it is certain that we stand on the floor of the Senate. They may shed all the crocodile tears at that late hour they want to shed, but I predict it will be difficult to erase the moral indignation of the world if they sacrifice to communism today Korea and Formosa, and then expect the world to rally to the support of Hong Kong, Malaya, and the rest of southeast Asia.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. I was very much interested in the distinguished Senator's comments today. Is the Senator from California aware of Mr. Bevin's announcement yesterday that the basis upon which they would discuss peace would be that of withdrawing from Korea, recognition of Communist China, and throwing the question of the control of Formosa into the United Nations?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Not only recognition of Communist China, but the admission of Communist China into the United Nations. I am familiar with the press dispatches.

Mr. MALONE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in this evening's Washington Star there appears a dispatch headed "Further delay faces the UN in settlement of Korea question."

It states:

> The General Assembly's 60-nation political committee was scheduled to meet at 3 p. m., but informed quarters said it probably would adjourn until next week because no one had any formal proposals to make.

Is the Senator familiar with the continued delay?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I had not been familiar with the press dispatch to which the Senator has referred, because I have not had an opportunity to read the evening newspapers or the ticker reports. However, I would say that there is no opportunity on the part of the Americans, the British, the French, and the Turks who are fighting in Korea today to adjourn until next week. I think it is outrageous that when men are dying day by day in Korea in the defense of the free world, the United Nations Organization, which pretends to represent the conscience of mankind, should adjourn from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, while we suffer over 42,000 casualties. I say that it is time for the President of the United States to say to the United Nations, "There comes a time when you must cease talking and begin acting. If you are not going to do it, I shall go before a joint session of the Congress of the United States and ask Congress to withdraw our membership from the United Nations." [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupants of the galleries will be in order.

Mr. MALONE. The distinguished Senator from California has been on the floor for a long time, and probably is not familiar with the fact that the news ticker announces that within the hour the State Department has informed the British Ambassador that their idea of having a holding situation in North Korea was to give them time to make up their minds. Apparently men are to be sacrificed on that basis.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. I wish to say that I commend strongly and almost in its entirety the excellent address and the splendid analysis of the whole foreign situation which has been made by the Senator from California. I should like to refer to three points, and then to ask a question of the Senator, if I may. I believe the Senator took high moral ground, and he took a position which will call to the attention of the people of this Nation in a way which has not been heretofore called to their attention, the fact that the withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea would bring on a blood bath of unprecedented proportions, and would mean the abandonment and cruel crucifixion of tens of thousands of South Koreans, and of North Korean refugees, too, whose sole offense has been to prefer democracy to communism. I think that this is high ground, and I think it will prove to have been taken to the very great enlightenment of the people of this Nation, in vividly calling to their attention the fact that there is a tremendous moral issue involved in this question which is now causing such deep concern to all of us.

The second point on which the Senator commented at several places in his very fine address, and to which I want to state my strong approval, is the clear word of caution which the Senator uttered, not once but several times, to the Government of India and the governments of other friendly countries in southeast Asia, but particularly India, to the effect that their oft-repeated intervention in sympathy with Communist China may well leave them friendless, alone, and helpless when the time comes for Communist aggression to extend itself against them, as it surely will, in the sequence of Communist plans. I believe this is a point that has long deserved to be clearly made on the floor of the Senate, and I commend the Senator for making it, as a true friend of those concerned.

I believe the third point overshadows the two points which I have just mentioned, and that is the one which was adverted to in the Senator's recent colloquy with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]. This point was mentioned several times by the Senator from California. The point is that it is quite apparent that a Munich of unparalleled proportions is being suggested and supported and advocated by those nations who as members of the United Nations are now unwilling or reluctant, and heretofore they have completely refused, to take action indicating a fact which is known to all the world, namely, that Communist China is an aggressor; and these nations are going a great deal further in suggesting and now insisting that Communist China be admitted to membership in the United Nations, as one of the great powers with veto power, which would present the spectacle of a new member, coming in on a plane equal in influence and authority to that of the United States of America, with hands red with the blood of American men, and assuming to sit down in that condition to participate in a solemn conclave which is devoted to the cause of peace and to the negotiation of world-wide peace and harmony. Such a Munich and such appeasement would, it seems to me, be so completely unforgivable by the conscience of mankind throughout the world that it would inescapably lead to the early dissolution and to the untimely death of the United Nations, the greatest effort which mankind has made up to now in its devoted search for peace. I hope that no such result will be accomplished.

The question I wanted to address to the Senator from California was for the RECORD. My own mail, going up into hundreds of letters, has indicated to me that the people of my State, as well as of other States who have written to me, clearly recognize the fact which I have last mentioned, and which was so much more ably mentioned by the Senator from California; namely, that such utter appeasement on such a grand scale would constitute an unparalleled Munich and would inescapably mean the death of the United Nations and the defeat of what that great organization stands for. My question is: Has the mail of the Senator from California, coming to him from the people of his great State—and I am sure that it comes from an even much greater and wider area in the United States—also indicated to him that the conscience of the American people, as reflected in hundreds and thousands of letters, has already reached the point that the American people have concluded, as expressed in their very solemn and dignified written expressions—and that they have unalterably concluded that such a Munich, such appeasement, and such refusal to brand red-handed aggression as such, and the proposed admission of Red China to membership in the United Nations, would in their judgment forever deprive the United Nations, so long as such philosophy prevailed, of the approval of the conscience of the American people? Has the Senator's correspondence, great as it is, indicated that that conclusion has been reached by hundreds and thousands of our best people throughout the Nation?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator from Florida, specifically in answer to his question, that my mail, in great quantities, has indicated the point which the Senator has raised.

I should like to make this observation: There are some of our colleagues, some of our editors, and some in the executive branch of the Government of the United States who wonder why it is that at this critical hour there is so much confusion among the American people on this very basic issue. I venture the opinion that one reason for the confusion has been that the American people have had held up to them, and have themselves held up, the United Nations as an ideal, as an organization which would morally stand strong when aggression threatened in any sector of the world. They have been disillusioned by the fact that the United Nations has failed in its leadership of the free people at this critical hour in our history. They have been so disillusioned in the thing to which they had tied their hopes, the thing in which they had expressed a great hope for saving the world from aggression, that it was like casting a ship loose from its moorings during rough weather.

As a result, when they see 2½ months of aggression on the part of Communist China, and the United Nations does not have the intestinal fortitude to say that it is aggression, how can we expect them to tie to such an organization? It is like telling them, as Mr. Malik does in the United Nations, that black is white or white is black. It is a topsy-turvy world. I believe that one of the reasons we are forced to have this great debate today is that the United Nations itself has contributed to undercutting the faith of the people in the moral leadership of that organization.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further observation?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I wish to say that I think the Senator has made a great contribution to this historic debate. I think it was necessary that somewhere in the course of this debate it be stated, as it has now been stated, that thousands and thousands of our best American citizens have reached the conclusion that this bald, inexplicable, unforgivable, shameless effort at appeasement, which is so clearly in progress, is recognized as such by them, and that if persisted in it will necessarily destroy the United Nations. I think that out of this record, those who can read and who are working for such an appeasement will understand that, detested as is the memory of a man named Chamberlain, with his umbrella, who once practiced appeasement, and whose name is connected with the original Munich, yet the thing which they propose, and the thing which they insist upon, defrauding of any chance of successful completion the prayers and devout efforts of all peace-loving humanity, would leave them in a position so far overshadowing Mr. Chamberlain and his umbrella that his memory would scarcely persist on the pages of history, so much greater, so much more enormous, so much more miserable, is the deliberate act which they have proposed, and to which apparently they are giving their every effort.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I know that the Senator has been a strong advocate of American assistance to the end of helping the Chinese Nationalist troops to the mainland, where they would be supplied with the means to at least divert the Red China armies.

I will not say that there has been opposition to that plan, but skepticism has been raised in the minds of many people, for three reasons.

First, they feel that if we assisted the Chinese Nationalists to land on China, there would then be at least a moral commitment to assist them with the Air Force and eventually with troops. That has been one deterrent, and the Senator has expressed his opinion on that subject this afternoon.

However, there are two other reasons why so many American people are reluctant to go along with this proposal. The first is that they fear that the means and the money put into such a venture on the part of the United States might not be spent for the purpose for which it was intended, but would be dissipated in one way or another. They believe that some of the contributions of the past have been dissipated, and that in the future such contributions might not be properly used.

The third reason is fear that the Nationalist Army of three or four hundred thousand men, once landed in China, would be ineffective in coping with the Red troops, which are supposed to number something like 4,000,000, I believe, at the present time. Will the Senator briefly express his opinion on the last two points—first, that the means and money would not be properly spent for the purpose for which they were given; and, second, that the comparatively small army of Chiang Kai-shek would be ineffective in opposing the greater armies of the Chinese Communists?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Very briefly in answer to the two queries, which I think are quite proper, let me say this: I am cognizant of the fact that there are those who have some misgivings for the reasons which have been stated. As I pointed out earlier, I have never advocated that aid be given to the Republic of China, or, for that matter, to any other Asiatic or European country, unless there was proper supervision. It was necessary to do that in Greece, and it is no disparagement of the Greek people to say that it was necessary. It was necessary to do it in other areas of the world. Therefore, I would not advocate giving this aid unless we were prepared to send a mission under the leadership of a man such as General Wedemeyer. There may be many others, but I mention him because he knows the Chinese theater. He knows the weaknesses of China. All nations, including our own, have weaknesses. If one reads his report on China, he will find that he was very critical, as properly he should have been critical, of some of the things which the Government of China had done or failed to do. Nevertheless, the Chinese knew him to be a critical friend, a man who recognized the importance of not letting China go down the drain into international communism.

So I believe that that phase of the problem could be safeguarded by sending a mission under the leadership of a man such as General Wedemeyer to supervise the distribution of the equipment and the training of the troops who would get it.

We did not have success in Greece until General van Fleet and his mission went over there to see that the Greeks were properly trained in the use of the equipment, and that it was getting to the troops where it was needed. That is the best answer I can make to the second question.

The third question is whether or not the army of 500,000—and there are more than 500,000, but I do not wish to use the exact figures for obvious reasons—of the Republic of China would be able to make an adequate showing against the several million troops reportedly on the side of the Chinese Communists.

I want to point out that it would be very difficult for the Chinese Communists to concentrate all their troops at any one point for several reasons. First, their railroad transportation and road network in China is very bad by our standards, and it takes a long time to move troops.

Second, the terrain of the country is such that it is a very difficult operation to concentrate large bodies of troops.

Third, there is enough discontent in the country that if large areas of China are stripped of Communist troops the guerrillas may come out and the civil population rise up and take over those areas behind the Communists. So the Communists would not dare to concentrate all their troops.

The Government of the Republic of China has the advantage of having a compact force, a very large coast line of China which is most difficult to defend, large areas of which do not have even today, with the Chinese Communists there, one soldier along the coast in a good many miles. So that the Nationalists are able, with a concentrated striking force, to strike at any one of several hundred places along the coast line of more than a thousand miles. In that situation they have an opportunity, in my judgment—and I do not rely on my own judgment, but I have talked with a great many persons in whom I have confidence—of bringing at the particular scene of activity a larger body of trained troops than the Chinese Communists will have, unless they can outguess the Nationalists as to where they are going to land.

In addition to that, there are a great many people who believe quite sincerely that once there has been made a substantial landing on the coast of China the disillusioned people of China who thought that nothing could be worse than the conditions under which they had lived, and that communism was going to bring them the new blessings of liberty and so forth; the farmer, who is now paying a larger tax than he ever paid under the Nationalist regime; the businessman, who has had his small business destroyed; the student, who thought, for idealistic reasons, that communism was the "wave of the future" who now understands that it is destructive of all the teachings of China of family life and religious life and everything else—will in considerable numbers augment the invasion force, as guerrillas and others who would join up so that they would have a chance to live again as freemen.

In this uncertain life in which we live and the uncertain world in which we exist no one can guarantee that those things would happen, but I would say from my personal observation, from seeing the morale of the people, many of them educated in our western universities and our eastern universities, and in New England and in the South, who are in the Republic of China today, that there are thousands of men of integrity in China who love freedom as much as we love freedom, and who recognize that they made some very serious mistakes in the past, and they are not going to repeat those mistakes if it is humanly possible to prevent it. I personally believe that if given some moral help now and some material aid, which they need, they would be able to make a successful invasion of the mainland.

COMMUNISM OR COLONIAL EMPIRE BONDAGE

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, the wrong kind of thinking has got us where we are today. It is time for those who have been doing this wrong thinking to change the pattern of their thoughts. There is no hope if wrong thinking continues to prevail.

As a matter of fact, the junior Senator from Nevada has long suspected that action has been substituted for thinking, in our dealings with world affairs.

There is nothing basically wrong with the United States, except our assumption that every nation that fought with us in World War II is and will forever be our friend.

PERMANENT INTERESTS DETERMINE FRIENDSHIPS

We need to remember that a great Englishman, Viscount Henry Temple Palmerston, a former Prime Minister, once said:

> We (England) have no permanent friendships or enmities; we have but permanent interests.

Mr. President, the British do not fight for principle; they frankly fight for profit.

This is still the basic policy, not only of England, but of all European and Asiatic nations.

Complete understanding of this pronouncement is the key to successful dealing with all foreign nations outside of the Western Hemisphere; a knowledge of where their current interests lie is the answer to the now pertinent question of where will our erstwhile allies be "when the chips are down" in the next war.

OBJECTIVE: OUR OWN ULTIMATE SAFETY

The present uncertainty makes it imperative that we start any defense preparations with a determination of the areas in the world that are necessary for us to currently defend for our own ultimate safety.

Proceeding upon this basis, the United States has nothing to fear.

The "permanent interests" to which that great former Prime Minister of England referred were doubtless the colonial empire possessions stretching from Hong Kong and Singapore to East Africa.

In my speech on the Senate floor on December 14, I listed 10 steps which in my opinion we should take in our present international difficulties.

The first step listed was:

> Forthwith stop assistance of every nature to Communist nations and to nations in any way assisting Russia or her satellites to consolidate Soviet gains and to prepare for World War III.

I have previously dealt with this point, listing 96 trade treaties under which Marshall plan countries are arming Russia and her satellites and providing the necessary manufactured and processed goods to enable Russia to consolidate her gains in Eastern Europe and China.

The second point is:

> Stop supporting colonial slavery in any form anywhere.

It is this point to which I wish to address myself briefly today. In order, I intend to discuss on future dates the remaining eight recommendations.

GRAVE SITUATION

The matter of going into a global war is a grave question that only the citizens of these United States should decide. They do the fighting and make the supreme sacrifice. No one man should take unto himself the right to gamble with our heritage and with the lives of our young men. Their only voice is through the Members of Congress.

Looking back to VJ-day, Mr. President, we see these things:

The greatest period of prosperity ever known to any nation has been squandered.

The public debt has gone up, instead of down.

The largest peacetime military appropriations in history have left the Nation unprepared.

The billions spent in foreign aid have left the Nation without one countable ally in all of Europe.

And the Nation at the present time is fighting a losing fight with Red China.

UNDERTAKING MORE THAN WE CAN DO

It would appear that our foreign policy can be summed up in this way:

Six percent of the people of the world live in the United States; and this 6 percent of the world's population has contracted to support as wards or be prepared to fight the other 94 percent of the people of the world.

The administration is to blame for committing this Nation to such a situation. History is replete with examples of how nations in the past have destroyed themselves in undertaking more than they were capable of handling.

The Elamites, 600 years B. C., destroyed themselves; the Athenians never recovered from their invasion of Sicily; the Romans took on more of the world than they could defend; Napoleon never recovered from his invasion of Russia; and a century later Hitler repeated Napoleon's folly.

So moves the world story.

FREE NATIONS BELIEVE IN DIGNITY AND WORTH OF MAN

In the President's state of the Union message he said:

> The free nations believe in the dignity and worth of man. We believe in independence for all nations.

The dignity and worth of man.

The junior Senator from Nevada is deeply interested in the working men and women of the world, particularly those oppressed by the nations we have aided. This Senator has not been stampeded into actions against labor, possibly because he himself has been a workingman. I know what it is to stand in front of a furnace and shovel in the coal when the heat was of such intensity as to cause my gloves to catch on fire.

I have known what it is to work in a glass factory. I grew up on a ranch. I have been associated all my life with working people, and I am not going to turn my back on them, whether they live in the United States, or in the work camps of colonies despoiled for England, France, or the Netherlands.

COLONIAL EMPIRE SLAVES WANT BETTER EXISTENCE

The people who are fighting Russia's battles in Asia today are fighting in the hope that communism can provide them a better existence than they obtained under colonialism.

If I were a laborer in Indochina or one of the other colonies of Asia and had to choose between communism and the continuance of colonial empire bondage, I would probably choose communism, just as the people of the Far East are now doing, because in their minds nothing can be worse than the colonial slavery under which they are living.

We are offering them nothing better.

CAPITALISM MEANS COLONIALISM TO NATIVES

We cannot expect to win the native of Indochina over to a love for capitalism, our system of economic life, as long as the native associates in his mind capitalism with the colonial slavery to which he is accustomed.

EASY CONVERTS TO COMMUNISM

All people under the yoke of colonial bondage are easy converts to communism or any other "ism" which means a change.

Empire-minded nations have farmed their colonies for the sole benefit of the mother country in each case. Apparently, it has never occurred to the officials of empire-minded nations to help the people of their possession.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTIN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MALONE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I take it that the Senator from Nevada refers to political colonialism, such as that which has been practiced by the countries of Europe in times past. Is there not also an industrial colonialism, such as is occurring today in countries in the Near East, particularly in regard to oil? I shall not mention by name the countries—the Senator knows which ones they are—where oil has been discovered. In those countries a few persons have become extremely rich as a result of the discovery and development of oil, whereas the great mass of the people of those countries are almost destitute. As the situation exists there today, Russia could take over those people without having them raise a hand in opposition, because of the industrial colonialism which prevails there.

Mr. MALONE. I should like to have the Senator understand that I am referring to the nations which have been dominated by colonial policies for more than 150 or 175 years.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Let me say that I understand the nature of the reference the Senator from Nevada has made. I was simply pointing out that the same thing is happening today, in a different way, in other countries, and in my opinion, it creates a very fertile field for the spread of any unknown doctrine which has not been practiced there up to the present time.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I would point out that at least the industrial colonizing nations make contracts with the leaders of those countries, they pay an enormous amount of money to the countries, and perhaps assist those in power within those countries to prevent much of the money reaching the wage earners. Some of the people are not even wage earners. How they e[illegible] hard to determine.

Mr. AIKEN. I am not saying that outside countries are doing the exploiting. It is done by a few people within those countries. It is domestic exploitation, which is as bad as colonial exploitation.

Mr. MALONE. The junior Senator from Nevada intends to discuss that particular subject at a later date, as one of the things laid down in his opening address on December 14; but at this time he wants to discuss particularly the matter of the colonial possessions of, let us say, England, France, the Netherlands, and Belgium, where, frankly, the colonies are farmed out as one would operate a farm in Vermont and expect an income from it. If one paid for the farm, he would expect to receive an income; and those countries expect incomes from their colonial possessions. For a hundred years they have prevented the industrial development of those nations. The existence of the raw materials in those areas constitutes the primary consideration for wanting to control them, in the first place, in order to force those raw materials to be sent to the mother country, and then to force their processing within the mother country. While I think the system is bad, we have not realized it. In other words, through contributions to empire-minded nations, we are in effect supporting a system which makes every native of these areas unhappy. Stated clearly, what we are doing is to give them a choice between our form of government, capitalism, and the form of government offered by Russia. The capitalistic form of government, our American way of life, is represented by colonial slavery; and the natives do not see how anything could be worse than that particular form, regardless of what might happen in the future. The result is that we are making Communists, hand over hand.

UNITED STATES GUILTY OF FINANCING SLAVERY SYSTEM

I am unhappy to say that our own Government, through the Marshall plan give-away program, has been guilty of financing a slavery system repulsive to every true American. Look how we have aided those who have perpetuated the colonial slavery system in the Malayan States, Indochina, and the Negro states of Africa.

MARSHALL-PLAN MONEY USED FOR VILE PURPOSE

Our taxpayers' money has been used by the ECA for the vile purpose of strengthening the yoke of bondage and slavery and perpetuating misery among the primitive peoples ruled and worked by imperial overlords. We should immediately stop this filthy business of bolstering colonial slavery.

WE HAVE TO OFFER SOMETHING BETTER

We cannot succeed in stopping communism in Asia and Africa by supporting a system which is considered worse by the residents of those areas.

We condemn Russia for her slave labor camps, while at the same time our Government helps Britain, France, and the Netherlands maintain theirs. In times past, we Americans prided ourselves upon being protectors of downtrodden people and champions of independence, but we no longer can make that claim. The United States has fallen from its high pedestal.

WE HELP ENGLAND DESPOIL HER COLONIES

We have gone too far in helping England develop her colonies, later to be more profitably despoiled. Britain's colonies cover 2,000,000 square miles. They consist of 36 separately governed areas with a total population of approximately 60,000,000, most of whom are uneducated and unskilled. Millions are primitive peoples still living in the tribal state. The bulk of the territory they inhabit is untouched by civilization. These are the downtrodden people Britain is keeping under the yoke for her selfish gain.

WE TURNED OUR BACK ON NORTH AFRICAN NATIVES

We should no longer help France to consolidate its economic and political domination in Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco. The French are operating a police state in north Africa.

President Roosevelt at Casablanca pledged American support for the independence of Morroco. That pledge has not been kept. We turned our back on these people, despite the fact that north African forces in the late war numbered 275,000, some 65,000 of whom died on the Allies' battlegrounds.

United States officials announced upon the formation of the United Nations in San Francisco in 1945 that henceforth all nations would be free under the auspices of that organization. In five short years we have repudiated that pronouncement and are now supporting the 150-year-old colonial empire system.

HALF SLAVE AND HALF FREE

President Lincoln's pronouncement that the United States could not exist half slave and half free is equally applicable to the world today.

We speak continually of defending the American way of life and at the same time support with our money and our military might a system quite different.

Is history to say of us that the United States of America fought to support a diabolical system of colonialism?

We are not going to get Asia to turn its back on communism unless something better than colonialism can be offered them in its place.

Our first step must be to deny all aid to those countries which practice the diabolical system of colonialism.

BLACK PEOPLE NOT YET ACCEPTED

Let us face the facts. Black people the world over are not yet accepted as equals. We condone this when we finance France which continues its slavery system in Africa.

We have been maneuvered into protecting Hong Kong for the British.

HONG KONG AND OPIUM TRADE

The history of Hong Kong and its control by the British is an ugly story criss-crossed with opium wars and opium traffic.

Britain's gaining of Hong Kong, confirmed by the Treaty of Nanking in 1842, was the chief result of the opium war. The history of Hong Kong since the British took it over has been inseparably connected with trade. First, and for many years, it was the opium trade. Next it was the center for traffic in slave labor for Australia. British interest in Asia has been trade.

NO PERMANENT FRIENDSHIPS—ONLY PERMANENT INTERESTS

What the Prime Minister of England said in 1860, "We—England—have no permanent friendships or enmities; we have but permanent interests," is still the English philosophy which dominates all European thinking today. The colonial empires—Britain, France, and the Netherlands—have their interests in what they can get out of their colonies. As things are now, with no change in our relations with these countries, when we fight communism in Asia, we are but protecting colonial slavery, which does not represent the American way of life.

WE MUST OPPOSE COLONIALISM

We should do everything in our power to oppose the ideological and economic system of colonialism which has always been distasteful to the American people, as emphasized by the American Revolution in 1776.

WE MUST PROVE TO NATIVES WE OPPOSE COLONIALISM

We must then sell the Asiatic people whom we would help on the idea that we are not on the side of colonialism and that we do not condone its abuses.

We cannot win them over unless we prove that we are against the colonial empire system of exploiting the weaker nations for the benefit of the stronger nations. We cannot do this as long as we support this system.

After we have cleared our skirts of the taint of aiding colonial slavery, then we must educate the Asiatic countries to the fact that capitalism, the American way of life, is not colonialism; it is our job to prove to them that we are not for colonialism any more than we are for communism.

WHAT MEN FIGHT FOR

Down through the centuries men have fought for self-preservation or for more bread or other substance. It appears that those who have been deciding our foreign policy have overlooked the great intercourse of trade, commerce, and profit. Peoples thoughout the world would rather work for profit than fight for glory and a grave. Nations are built by businessmen; destroyed by diplomats.

UNITED NATIONS WORTHLESS TO UNITED STATES

In his state of the Union message, the President also said that we "have laid the cornerstone for a peaceful world in the United Nations."

UN HANDICAPS OUR EFFORTS IN KOREA

Let us look at the United Nations.

While our boys in a desperately uneven struggle are being killed by the thousands by the Chinese Communists, President Truman announces that the United States has no intention of bombing Communist China or the enemy supply lines in Manchuria—the sources of men and material being used against us—unless the United Nations tells him to. The United Nations has proved itself to be simply a forum for continuous smear for our honor, our ideals, and our purposes.

The United Nations is being utilized for a purpose which it cannot, by its very nature, fulfill.

A FORUM FOR INSULTS TO UNITED STATES

After Pearl Harbor in 1941 there was no international forum in New York where Japanese and other Axis representatives could blackguard the United States as much as they wished. But there have been no restrictions on the activities of Mr. Wu and Mr. Vishinsky.

How long the American people will put up with a situation which combines the worst features of both war and appeasement remains to be seen.

UN CANNOT PRODUCE

We expect something from the United Nations which it is not prepared to produce.

In a United Nations, which is supported almost wholly by our dollars and whose present fighting forces are 90 percent that of the United States, the commitment to resist aggression everywhere is a commitment to fight perpetual war, and, as it turns out, these wars are to be in the places, against the forces, and on the terms of Communist Russia.

The worthlessness of the United Nations as an agency for directing an army has been proved, yet it is this ineffective morally bankrupt debating society to which President Truman looks for authority and field direction in fighting for the best interest of the United States.

RUSSIA HAS NOT LOST A MAN

Russia now has taken over in all of Eastern Europe. It now has most of Asia. Yet not a Russian has been killed on any battle line.

ARE ENGLAND AND FRANCE OUR ALLIES?

Who are our allies?

A news dispatch of January 6, by the Associated Press, tells us that Great Britain has stepped up its shipments of raw rubber, an essential war material, to Russia. In 1950 it shipped around 10,000 tons, or 20 times as much raw rubber, to Russia as it shipped in 1949.

I would say, Mr. President, that on the occasion of my visit to Singapore in November 1948, huge shipments of raw rubber and tin were being made directly from Singapore to Russia at that moment; and they have never ceased.

BRITAIN ARMING THE REDS

Recently, Winston Churchill charged—and the Labor government admitted—that British factories were turning out tools, including those to repair tanks, on order from the Soviet Union. Only within the past few days have such orders been embargoed.

The rubber-shipment figures did not include the amount of rubber which the Soviet Union purchased directly from British Malaya. Some sources estimated this at 62,598 tons in the first 11 months of 1950.

England is not the only country sending to the Reds war materials with which to kill American boys.

FRANCE ARMING THE REDS

France has only recently refused to cancel an order for 139,000 tons of steel rails for the Chinese Communists. When our Ambassador threatened to stop Marshall-plan aid to France unless France canceled the order, the French said our demand was "brutal." Our dollars build French mills to produce steel with which to kill our boys. Could that be what the State Department likes to refer to as "total diplomacy"?

TRUMAN ADMINISTRATION ARMING THE REDS

The French, in refusing to stop arming our enemy, point out that Red China also has ordered 13,000 tons of rails from West Germany and that this has been done with the full approval of the American authorities in Germany.

France also points out that the United States was daily doing business with the Communists until late October, months after the beginning of the Korean conflict.

BRITAIN AND FRANCE ON BOTH SIDES

As a matter of fact, France has denied the Soviet accusations that she broke the Franco-Russian military and economic alliance by joining the North Atlantic Pact with the United States and other countries. In other words, France is insisting that she is a friend of Russia.

In 1942 Britain and Russia entered into a 20-year military and economic alliance. Now both the French and British solemnly insist that their alliances with Russia are as good as ever.

The Government of the United States has been acting for almost 2 years on the assumption that Britain and France are its military partners, and that their good faith is not to be questioned. But, even as Mr. Truman, Secretary Acheson, and General Eisenhower plan to pool American troops in Europe with the forces of these nations for common defense against Russia, both Britain and France assure Russia that they are its military and economic allies. That is a pact which each has signed separately with Russia and which they insist is in operation. There is no attempt to cancel it, Mr. President, and it reads startlingly like the North Atlantic Pact which has been signed by us.

SOMEONE IS LYING

Someone is lying, and the subject of interest to Americans is whether they or the Russians, or both nations, are to be played for suckers by the British and French. There is going to be an awful let-down if it turns out to be us.

NO HARD-HEADED EXAMINATION OF WHAT WE CAN DO

War or no war, it is obvious this country is contributing to its own destruction by refusing to shorten its lines and define its commitments. In attempting to save face, it is losing its shirt in an ideological struggle that has far less practical bearing on American survival than is imagined generally.

With so much money and effort down the drain already, it is surprising there has been no hard-headed examination of possible alternatives to the disastrous policies of the past 5 years. There have been few attempts to appraise realistically the probable effects of measures other than those taken.

PRACTICAL STEPS IN ASIA

Mr. President, China can be blockaded. Its centers of military concentration, industry and communication can be shattered by air attack. Chiang Kai-shek can be encouraged and aided in using Formosa as a base for raids and descents on the China coast. Anti-Communist guerrillas can be helped. Japan can be rearmed. If Chinese volunteers can appear in Korea, why not Japanese?

ASIATICS CAN STOP ASIATICS

The flood tide of aggressive Asiatic communism can be stemmed by Asiatics. Our repeated failures to give a fighting chance to our potential friends in Asia, to the South Koreans before last June, to the Japanese, to the Chinese Nationalists is calculated to raise the old question: Stupidity or treason?

CAN WE WIN WITH THIS STATE DEPARTMENT?

Probably there is nothing in prospect in Asia but defeat, disaster, and disgrace until the State Department is put in charge of someone with wit enough to realize that a regime which throws a million men in battle array against us is really waging war, and firmness enough to make a clean sweep of "experts" of the Alger Hiss and Owen Lattimore type of thinking.

Mr. President, in an Associated Press dispatch in an afternoon newspaper, it is reported that the United Nations, not having made up its mind on anything, and no one having anything to offer, has adjourned until next week. I suppose it is generally known that when President Truman washed his hands of the American Army, after taking what he called a police action in Korea, and was successful in getting the United Nations to approve his action, he left the matter in the hands of the United Nations. What did that organization do? It arranged for a cease-fire committee, the so-called Committee of Three. This committee is made up of the representatives of Canada, Iran and India. It is interesting to note that Canada's mother country, Great Britain, has recognized Communist China, and so has India.

This committee is to arrange for a cease-fire or a truce, on terms the Chinese Communists will agree to. There is no attempt to call the Red Chinese outright agressors, but only weak-kneed attempts to placate the enemy and cater to his sensitivities. This, of course, is also born out by the failure to permit MacArthur to bomb the bases and northern-most supply lines of the enemy.

Seemingly unmindful of all history, heedless of much experience, and somewhat thoughtless about its safety, this Nation rushes forward to a destiny unknown. In other words, it is substituting action for thinking.

STATE DEPARTMENT SAYS CHINESE REDS ARE OUR FRIENDS

As a horde of Red Chinese swept southward in Korea, the Secretary of State spoke of starting a number of measures designed to increase the effectiveness of United Nations action against aggression. About the same time Mr. Dulles, the United States representative in the General Assembly of the United Nations, held forth. Reviewing the occasions upon which the United States had demonstrated its good will toward China, he told of the bond of friendship which had been forged between the peoples of the two countries, and then added that this is a bond "that the Soviet Government is now trying, and I am convinced, fruitlessly, to break."

AMERICAN BOYS LOOKING INTO MUZZLES OF CHINESE GUNS

Such was the language of the American diplomat as the American soldier in Korea looked into the muzzle of a Chinese gun, and tried to figure out how the man who was about to shoot him could be his friend.

LET US FACE THE PAINFUL TRUTH

Lacking indeed in the administration was a voice that spoke with the clarity of one that still echoes in the annals of history. Have we forgotten the words of Patrick Henry? Speaking to a convention of citizens in Richmond, Va., on March 23, 1775, he said:

> Mr. President, it is natural to man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth. * * * Is this the part of wise men engaged in a great and arduous struggle for liberty? * * *
>
> For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth—to know the worst and provide for it.
>
> Let us not, I beseech you, sir, deceive ourselves longer.

Thus rang the voice of Patrick Henry.

BOAST LOUDLY AND CARRY A LITTLE STICK

Theodore Roosevelt embodied his concept of foreign policy in the homely proverb, "Speak softly but carry a big stick." This administration not only departed from that policy, but it reversed it. It has boasted loudly and carried a little stick.

The question that must be faced now is not what we might like to do, or what, under better conditions, we ought to do, but what we can do.

CAN WE FIGHT 20 KOREAS?

Is anyone so foolish as to think that the United States can meet aggression wherever it occurs? Must we fight another Korea? Must we fight 20 Koreas?

EISENHOWER TO EUROPE

Without the approval of Congress, the President has sent General Eisenhower to Europe. For what purpose? We should withdraw General Eisenhower from his military headquarters in Europe, because his presence there is regarded by the Europeans as a pledge of unlimited American support. If such a pledge has been made, the Congress of the United States has no knowledge of it, and all reference to the Constitution of the United States has been swept aside.

THE THOUGHT OF MANY AMERICANS

The defense of America is the paramount duty of Americans. This is the thought that has been occurring to many Americans as the United States wallows deeper in its vague commitments and spends billions from one end of the world to another.

EUROPE TAKES ALL, GIVES NOTHING

Europe has taken aid, picked from the pockets of our hard-pressed taxpayers, and has called for more, but she has not used that aid for her own defense. Europe's will to defend cannot be imposed from the outside.

EUROPE SHOULD SHOW INTEREST IN DEFENDING HERSELF

If we should withhold foot soldiers from Europe, at least until she shows some interest in defending herself, it would serve notice on the world that we are determined not to involve the country in another war just as futile as the two world wars and the Korean War. Europeans cannot expect us to do for them what they have failed to do for themselves.

We must do the practical, sensible things to protect our American people.

UNITY?

Mr. President, let me mention one more important point before I close.

The President asked for unity in his state of the Union speech, and on the same day his representative, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, William M. Boyle, Jr., issued a statement asserting that the Democratic Party would continue to seek new partisan advantage in the fields of foreign relations and national defense.

What does the President mean by "unity"?

Are we asked to turn all decision-making over to a single official in charge of our country? Does the administration want no scrutiny, no examination, no study, only obedience?

THE UNITY THAT TOOK CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY AWAY FROM CONGRESS

Is it not this kind of philosophy that has caused the administration to take away from Congress its exclusive constitutional authority to approve treaties?

UNITY IN MISERY

There certainly is unity in the misery of our times and the President bears no heavier burden upon his spirit than the smallest among us.

UNITY IN COST

There is also unity in the terrific cost of these troubled times upon each family. This cost is represented in different ways:

First. Taxes.

Second. The constantly rising cost of living.

Third. Depreciated currency, which lessens and destroys the value of our savings, including insurance policies.

These costs are as great upon each of our families as they are upon Mr. Truman's family.

NO UNITY IN TAX EXEMPTION OF PRESIDENT

As a matter of fact, Mr. Truman is tax-exempt to a certain extent. In that, there is no unity.

His advantage seems to be unwarranted. The cost of maintaining him in the White House with cars, private airplanes, private yachts, and so on, burdens the taxpayer with nearly $5,000,000 a year.

It would seem that when all of us are paying terrifying taxes, the President might become unified with the rest of the country by paying full taxes and cutting down his running expenses, for which we pay.

After all, no one should get rich out of these troubled times. The country would welcome unity on that score.

A LITTLE SICK OF WORD "UNITY"

Let me read you a few lines from an editorial in the January 2, 1951, issue of the New York Daily Mirror:

We have heard so many appeals for unity of recent days that, frankly, we are a little sick of the word and more than a little suspicious of the chorus of appealers.

Unity for providing arms for Americans who must fight, yes.

Unity in sacrifice and in the period of austerity that is ahead of us—in which it appears we will say good-by once and for all to the good old days, yes.

Unity to the point that we are supposed to shut our lips and refrain from criticizing the bird brains in Washington who have got us into this awful mess, no.

As far as we can determine, there are a lot of people in Washington who confuse unity with dictatorship.

They would like us to swallow Acheson without a burp—in the holy interest of unity.

They would like us to forget the long series of tragic bunglings, extending from the Roosevelt administration into the Truman administration, and to be good little boys and never mention them again—in the interests of unity.

Bunk. Stalin has that kind of unity. Hitler had it. Mussolini had it.

It is not the kind of unity that can be fostered in a free country, and it is not unity at all. It is dead rot.

If we have strength, it is because we have critics, men of courage and patriotism and status, unafraid of the petty insults of the one-world political mob.

True unity can come only in the tempering fires of national, controversial discussion, among a people alert, aware, free, and permitted to speak their minds. Suppression, whether it is voluntary or enforced, is the agent of disunity.

Thank God that Americans who hold American interests paramount to all other interests have not lost their voices. Unity is not the sheeplike, blind pursuit of a crooked trail over a precipice.

A RE-CREATION OF A NATIONALISTIC SPIRIT

A rereading of the Declaration of Independence, a re-creation of a nationalistic spirit, is called for. Let us get back on the road of self-determination, self-respect, and self-preservation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the list of 10 points submitted in my address to the Senate on December 14.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Forthwith stop assistance of every nature to Communist nations and to nations in any way assisting Russia or her satellites to consolidate Soviet gains and to prepare for world war III.

2. Stop supporting colonial slavery in any form anywhere.

3. Oppose the recognition of Communist China by the United Nations with every means at our command.

4. Three suggested approaches to the war in Korea and Asia:

(a) We could do the obvious thing—arm Chiang Kai-shek's Nationals and guerrillas to furnish the foot soldiers for the job, then under General MacArthur make the most efficient use of our air power, our Navy, including submarines, to destroy the war-making power of Communist Korea and the aggressor Communist China troops.

(b) We could withdraw from Korea, arm and equip Chiang Kai-shek's troops and let him do the job. It would require a longer time but he would engage the Communist forces to the extent that it would be doubtful if they could harass us for a considerable time and Nationalist China would then be fighting Communist China in a China civil war and the Russian dominated Communists would eventually be defeated.

(c) We can completely abandon Korea and China, with all of its possible consequences and repercussions. We can then establish our first line of defense through Japan, Formosa, Okinawa, Guam, the Philippines, Indonesia, New Guinea, and Australia.

(d) If these suggestions should be discarded, then we can come home and defend the Western Hemisphere. We must be prepared to defend this continent in any case.

The one thing that we cannot do is to continue the present course of indecision and nervous jittery attitude in Asia.

5. Inform the governments of Europe which still maintain political and economic agreements with the Soviet Union that these should be terminated at the earliest possible date, as a prerequisite to the continued friendship and assistance of Europe by the United States. Both England and France have separate economic and military pacts with Communist Russia reading startlingly like the North Atlantic Pact that they have signed with us.

6. Give no more money as loans or gifts to any government, but if such help is necessary, then loan such funds to private business in strategic areas, without weakening our economy, in the same manner and upon the same terms that the RFC loans such funds to private business in this country in times of stress.

7. Build as rapidly as possible a military force, spearheaded by an adequate submarine fleet and an air corps of whatever number of groups may be called for, and install radar equipment to protect the Western Hemisphere.

8. If the European people will enlist in their own armies and furnish the ground troops, then serve notice on Russia that any move on Europe will be met with an aggressive aerial attack on their means of making war, using every means at our command to defeat their purpose of controlling Europe.

9. In every possible way protect and strengthen our national economy; while making all possible speed toward proper preparedness, guard well our national economy; stop wasting the hard-earned dollars of our taxpayers through Marshall plan and other give-away schemes; inaugurate a business-like fiscal policy.

10. Clean up our own Government. Throw out the Communists, Communist associates, adherents to foreign ideologies, persons of abnormal moral weakness, and other dangerous security risks. The Armed Services Committees of the Congress should immediately institute a thorough investigation to determine why we are not prepared to fight a war.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a copy of a United Press dispatch from London dated January 10, according to which the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Bevin, laid down several points for stopping the war in Korea, which included recognition of Communist China, withdrawing from Korea, and putting Formosa in the hands of the United Nations for discussion and disposition.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS CEASE-FIRE PRELIMINARY, BEVIN PROPOSES UN SEAT FOR CHINA

LONDON, January 10.—British Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin has told the Commonwealth Prime Ministers Conference that Communist China should be admitted to the UN to bring about a cease-fire in Korea and a solution of far eastern problems, it was learned today.

Mr. Bevin submitted a working paper to the conference outlining six main points:

Recognition and admission of Communist China to the UN.

Negotiations should be started after this action to bring about a cease-fire in Korea.

Establishment of a security zone in Korea.

Thereafter a UN commission should be set up to handle subsequent problems.

Gradual withdrawal of all UN and Chinese Communist forces from Korea.

A free and impartial plebiscite regarding the unification of Korea.

The conference has laid aside the far eastern problem temporarily to await future developments on the subject, including those in the UN.

"It would be safe to say that British policy in the Far East today greatly depends on what happens in Korea," informed sources said. "Neither the British Government nor any commonwealth government yet knows what the policy would be if the Chinese Communists persist in their drive to force the UN into the sea."

The conference turned to a discussion of the world's supply of raw materials today and also may discuss European affairs.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an Associated Press dispatch from Lake Success, outlining the fact that the General Assembly's Political Committee was scheduled to meet at 3 p. m., but that informed quarters said it probably would adjourn until next week because no one had any formal proposals ready yet in regard to how to stop the war, while delaying any possible defense by cutting the supply lines of the Communist troops.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star of January 11, 1951]

FURTHER DELAY FACES UN IN SETTLEMENT OF KOREAN WAR QUESTION—NO FORMAL CEASE-FIRE PROPOSALS READY YET; ADJOURNMENT LIKELY

LAKE SUCCESS, January 11.—The United Nations today faced a new delay in its quest for a Korean peace settlement.

The General Assembly's 60-nation Political Committee was scheduled to meet at 3 p. m., but informed quarters said it probably would adjourn until next week because no one had any formal proposals ready yet.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an article entitled "British Papers Hit UN War Reports," published in the New York Times of January 9, 1951. The article is written by Benjamin Welles, and is dated London, January 8.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH PAPERS HIT UN WAR REPORTS—MIRROR SAYS ESTIMATES BY AIR FORCE OF ENEMY DEAD IN KOREA ARE "ALMOST ALWAYS FALSE"

(By Benjamin Welles)

LONDON, January 8.—Today for the fourth successive day one of Britain's mass circulation newspapers attacked alleged distortion and hysteria in communiqués issued on the Korean fighting by Gen. Douglas MacArthur's headquarters.

The Daily Mirror, which reputedly has the widest daily circulation in Britain, has been maintaining that estimates of the enemy killed and buildings destroyed issued by the United States Fifth Air Force, under General MacArthur's command, have been valueless because almost always false.

This campaign has been taken up in other widely read newspapers.

The Daily Mirror's campaign led off last Thursday with front-page editorial entitled "Silly Headquarters Hand-Outs on Korean War." Next day the front page was dominated by a headline, "Fairy tales from Korea: the world is not getting the truth."

[The United States Far East Air Forces, taking note of charges in the British press, denied on January 6 that Air Force communiqués exaggerated the losses inflicted on the enemy by air action.]

CORRESPONDENT BACK FROM FRONT

"The picture of actual events in Korea and especially of the fighting—or lack of it—has been dreadfully distorted," said David Walker, Daily Mirror correspondent, who recently returned from the Korean front.

"This," said Mr. Walker, "was the fault of Alice in Wonderland information handed out to the press in Tokyo or at Eighth Army headquarters."

Specifically he listed Air Force claims such as 341 enemy killed, 91 enemy killed, or, on another occasion, 50 enemy killed in a tunnel.

"A modern 10-year-old boy in short trousers knows that, whether it be low-flying jets or high-flying B–29's, no air force can possibly know exactly how many people it has killed," Mr. Walker asserted.

Yesterday the Sunday Pictorial, which is owned by the same interests as the Daily Mirror, said in a front-page editorial headed "Is this a private war?" that British troops had been ordered by United States headquarters to retreat continuously, in some cases 200 miles, without ever sighting the enemy.

WILLOUGHBY IS CHIDED

Lord Beaverbrook's Sunday Express also took up the cry yesterday by turning its attention to Brig. Gen. Charles A. Willoughby, General MacArthur's intelligence chief.

"If his communiqués are to be believed," the Express said, "his intelligence system is nothing short of miraculous." Noting that a communiqué of December 26 stated that there were 444,406 Communist enemy forces in Korea, of whom 277,173 were Chinese and 167,233 North Koreans, a Sunday Express columnist said:

"I have never seen a wartime report of enemy strength in such precise terms. * * * What kind of man is this General Willoughby? Is he, as his critics say, publicity officer for MacArthur or is he a secret service genius?"

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an editorial entitled "Sure Road to Disaster," published in the Boston Evening American of January 3, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SURE ROAD TO DISASTER

The Truman administration, having bungled the Nation into a disastrous war in Korea and into the imminent prospect of a world-wide conflict, chooses this anxious moment as the time to deliver a damaging blow to the Nation's economy.

The administration, hostile as it is to American industry, nevertheless recognizes the fact that only a swift and enormous increase of industrial output now can save the Nation from disaster.

Accordingly, the administration is urgently appealing to industry for fresh miracles of production.

But at the same time the administration has sent a delegation of State Department officials to Torquay, England, to give away to foreign nations the American market on which American industry depends for its strength and its existence.

This betrayal of American security is being accomplished through the International Trade Conference, and the method is simple.

The State Department delegation, acting on and abusing the authority of the Trade Agreement Act of 1934, simply grants drastic reductions in our tariff rates on whatever products foreign nations wish to send into our domestic market to compete with our own products.

And since the products of many of those nations come from machines operated by low-wage labor or even slave labor, our products frequently cannot compete.

Already the Truman administration's fatuous tariff reductions have put long-established American industries out of business.

Every such collapse takes away the jobs of American workers and gives them to workers in a foreign land. It is always an economic disaster to America.

But in these times it is also a military disaster, since it deprives the Nation of an urgently needed source of production.

In view of this obvious fact, the Truman administration's insistence on continuing and accelerating, at Torquay, the progress of destroying American productive capacity can only be attributed to the pathological confusion that pervades all the administration's thinking.

The administration must be halted in its bemused and disastrous course, for the Nation's safety.

Senator MALONE, of Nevada, suggests that the Eighty-second Congress accomplish it by permitting the Trade Agreement Act to expire next June 30.

Better still, let the Eighty-second Congress repeal the Trade Agreement Act immediately before the current sell-out at Torquay can be consummated.

HEALTHY SIGN

It is a very good and beneficial thing for the United States that some of its statesmen have not lost the courage to speak their minds.

One of these statesmen is Senator GEORGE MALONE, who recently told his colleagues:

"We have fumbled ourselves into a position of defending the self-interest of almost every nation in the world at the expense of our own.

"We have been soft-talked into apologizing that the appropriations passed on the floor of the Senate for the benefit of foreign nations are not larger—and if someone inadvertently mentions our own best interests, he is immediately branded an isolationist."

As long as statesmen can speak out like that, our freedoms will survive.

Unity based on silence, or fear to express one's mind, is not unity at all.

It is the selfsame regimentation which has made Stalin a dictator and a tyrant.

If we enjoy strength, it is because we have leaders like Herbert Hoover who exploded the greatest issue of our times—the one involving our very lives—and who caused millions of Americans to demand a reexamination of our policies and practices.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an editorial entitled, "Unity Is Not Silence," published in the New York Daily Mirror of January 2, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITY IS NOT SILENCE

We have heard so many appeals for unity of recent days that, frankly, we are a little sick of the word and more than a little suspicious of the chorus of appealers.

Unity for providing arms for Americans who must fight, yes.

Unity in sacrifice and in the period of austerity that is ahead of us—in which it appears we will say good-by once and for all to the good old days, yes.

They would like us to forget the long series of tragic bunglings, extending from the Roosevelt administration into the Truman administration, and to be good little boys and never mention them again—in the interests of unity.

Bunk. Stalin has that kind of unity. Hitler had it. Mussolini had it.

It is not the kind of unity that can be fostered in a free country, and it is not unity at all. It is dead rot.

If we have strength, it is because we have criticism.

Why, even Mr. Acheson apparently no longer feels that the Chinese Communists are simple agrarians, and he has become quite a vocal anti-Communist.

If we have strength, it is because we have great critics like Herbert Hoover, men of courage and patriotism and stature, unafraid of the petty insults of the one-world political mob.

It was Herbert Hoover who exploded the greatest issue of our times, the vital issue of our lives, out into the open, into national debate and scrutiny and reexamination.

And the reverberations of that explosion from among the people have had a rocking and shocking and altogether salutary effect upon the policy makers who smugly believed they knew the temper and will of the people and who were wrong.

True unity can come only in the tempering fires of national, controversial discussion, among a people alert, aware, free, and permitted to speak their minds. Suppression, whether it is voluntary or enforced, is the agent of disunity.

"We have fumbled ourselves into a position of defending the self-interest of almost every nation in the world at the expense of our own," says Senator GEORGE MALONE on the Senate floor. "We have been soft-talked into apologizing that the appropriations passed on the floor of the Senate for the benefit of foreign nations are not larger—and if someone inadvertently mentions our own best interests, he is immediately branded an isolationist."

Thank God that Americans who hold American interests paramount to all other interests have not lost their voices. Certainly they have not lost their audience. Unity is not the sheeplike, blind pursuit of a crooked trail over a precipice.

UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION IN THE ANTHRACITE AREA OF PENNSYLVANIA

During Mr. MALONE's address,

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for about 5 minutes to make a statement, without the Senator losing the floor thereby?

Mr. MALONE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania under those conditions, with the understanding that whatever the Senator has to say shall appear at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the American people will be called upon to assume an extremely heavy burden of taxation to pay the cost of our preparations for national defense.

Even though we escape the tragedies of another world war, as we all hope and pray, the cost of these defense preparations will have a profound effect upon the standard of living which we now enjoy.

We are now engaged in a great program of industrial expansion. We are pouring out billions of dollars in order to assure vastly increased production of everything needed to arm and equip our Armed Forces. In planning and administering that program it is incumbent upon every agency of Government to protect the taxpayers from every form of wasteful expenditure.

In this connection I have called the attention of the President, the Secretary of Defense and the heads of the war mobilization agencies to a situation in my own State of Pennsylvania where there is an opportunity to save many millions of dollars and at the same time alleviate the worst unemployment condition in the Nation.

I refer to the anthracite coal area of Pennsylvania which, according to the Federal Government's own survey, has been the hardest hit economically in the United States.

The metropolitan districts in two counties in this area, Lackawanna and Luzerne, are the only remaining districts in the Nation that are classified by the Bureau of Employment Security of the United States Department of Labor as E areas. That classification, as the Senate is aware, is the lowest designation given.

It means that at least 12 percent of the available labor force is unemployed.

This labor force, of which more than 12 percent is unemployed, is made up of skilled workers, good hard working, patriotic Americans. They ask only a decent opportunity to work. They are well qualified to render a real service to the Nation in the defense program.

Here is a surplus of manpower, ready and able to apply their skills and craftsmanship in the national interest. That is why I urge that contracts be channeled into these areas where they are so badly needed.

The expanding defense production program will call for the construction of many new manufacturing plants. Some of these unquestionably will be located in sparsely populated sections.

In such areas much additional construction will be required, such as housing for workers, service establishments, recreational centers, hospitals, schools, and churches. In many places it will be necessary to provide transportation facilities. In addition it will be necessary to recruit workers from other parts of the country and relocate them in the new defense factory areas.

Mr. President, none of these costly factors will enter into the building of defense plants in the anthracite area of Pennsylvania.

With economy in mind it seems to me that every consideration should be given to the advantages from which the Nation can benefit in this section.

An adequate supply of skilled manpower is immediately available.

Existing churches, schools, hospitals, recreational facilities, and cultural centers are ample to serve the needs of their respective communities.

All necessary transportation facilities are now functioning.

Mr. President, in bringing this situation to the attention of my colleagues, I do not imply that the anthracite area in Pennsylvania is the only one which is in need of such help as may be gained through the defense program. There are other sections where similar conditions exist but not to the same critical extent.

I am therefore urging that a substantial saving be made by placing a share of the defense contracts and building some of the new defense plants in areas which have a labor surplus, adequate housing and other facilities rather than in places where the Government will have to start from scratch.

Such a policy would not only speed up the program, but, in addition, would save scarce building material for other essential construction and would lighten the burden on the taxpayers.

Mr. President, I have made these facts available to the President and to the heads of various agencies which have the responsibility for mobilizing our industrial strength for defense production.

For the information of my colleagues I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a copy of a letter I have addressed to President Truman, General Marshall, the Honorable Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization, the Honorable William H. Harrison, Director of the Defense Production Administration, and the Honorable W. Stuart Symington, Chairman of the National Security Resources Board.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I want to call your attention to an area in my State of Pennsylvania, which, according to the Federal Government's own surveys, has been the hardest hit economically in the entire United States.

I refer to the anthracite coal region of Pennsylvania where there is a surplus of manpower which can render a real service in the national defense program.

On November 5, the United States Bureau of the Census issued a population report covering the 168 standard metropolitan areas of the Nation. The figures are for April 1, 1950, the official date of the 10-year census of population.

The report shows that Luzerne County, Pa., which includes the cities of Wilkes-Barre and Hazleton, had a population of 391,226 on April 1. In striking contrast, the county population was 441,518 in the 1940 census. Thus, in a decade, the district's population declined by 11.4 percent. In the same decade the national population gain was 14.3 percent.

Bordering Luzerne County on the north is Lackawanna County which includes the city of Scranton. This county's population was 256,208 in the 1950 census, a drop of 14.9 percent from its 301,243 population of 1940.

Of the 168 standard metropolitan areas listed on November 5, nearly all reported population gains. Among those which had losses, the Scranton and Wilkes-Barre areas were by far the hardest hit.

Recent reports of the Bureau of Employment Security of the United States Department of Labor disclose that the Scranton and Wilkes-Barre areas are the only two remaining E areas in the United States. As you know, an E area is the lowest classification given. It means that at least 12 percent of the labor force is unemployed.

Thus, unemployment conditions in these sections are the worst in the Nation, despite the fact that such a very large portion of the population has already moved away to seek work.

At present our Government is engaged in a vast industrial expansion program for national defense. If some contracts under that program were placed in Lackawanna and Luzerne Counties it would go a long way toward alleviating the critical unemployment situation and at the same time would give these patriotic, hard-working people an opportunity to do real service in the country's time of need.

In the expanding defense program, it will be necessary to erect new factory buildings. I urge that some be built in these areas. If the experience of World War II means anything, many manufacturing plants will be erected in open, thinly populated portions of the Nation. This means the Government will have to build and pay for much construction in addition to the new factories.

It will have to provide housing for workers. It will have to build schools and recreation centers. It will have to provide transportation systems to serve these workers.

In addition, it will have to recruit workers in other parts of the country and transplant them in the new defense factory areas.

For your consideration, I submit the advantages offered by the Wilkes-Barre and Scranton areas:

An adequate supply of skilled labor is available immediately.

Schools, transportation, and stores are already there.

So are theaters, playgrounds, athletic fields, and other recreational facilities. The money to build them can be saved for the taxpayers. The scarce building materials can be saved for other essential construction.

I urge the Government and its agencies to take advantage of these factors. In that way, not only the Scranton-Wilkes-Barre area, but also the State and Nation would be helped.

Will you please give this matter prompt attention? I would deeply appreciate being advised concerning any steps your agency can take in the establishment of defense plants or the placing of defense orders in this area where they are so badly needed.

QUALIFICATIONS OF ELECTORS—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have today introduced in the Senate for myself and 11 other Senators from Southern States a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the qualifications of electors participating in the election of elective Federal officials, including electors for President or Vice President, and Senators and Representatives in Congress. The proposed new article of the Constitution contains two sections, as follows:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax or to meet any property qualifications.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The adoption of this amendment as a part of the Federal Constitution would result in preventing both the United States and any of the States of the Union from denying or abridging the right of citizens from participating in the election of Federal officials because of failure to pay any poll or head tax or any tax of any other kind or to meet any property qualification. The adoption of this amendment would, therefore, bring a complete end to the so-called poll tax controversy and would at the same time prevent the setting up of some new requirement as a qualification for voting, such as the requirement that some other tax be paid or some certain class or amount of property be owned by a citizen in order to qualify him for voting.

It will be recalled that I introduced an identical joint resolution in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress on January 13, 1949, for nine other southern Senators and myself. This resolution was never acted upon during the Eighty-first Congress by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary to which it was referred. I am now glad to announce that in reintroducing this joint resolution today I am joined by the following distinguished Senators as cosponsors, namely, my colleague from Florida, Mr. SMATHERS, Mr. GEORGE, of Georgia; Mr. HOEY and Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina; Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON, of Virginia; Mr. O'CONOR, of Maryland; Mr. ELLENDER and Mr. LONG, of Louisiana; Mr. MCCLELLAN and Mr. FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas.

We sponsors of this joint resolution strongly believe that the resolution should be speedily submitted by this Congress to the States for ratification, and, if so submitted, we believe that it will be quickly ratified by at least the required 36 States. Because we are so sure that the requisite number of States would speedily ratify the resolution we are quite agreeable to the allowing of any reasonable short period of time for the consideration and ratification of this resolution. In the case that either the Committee on the Judiciary or the Senate feels that such a time limitation should be imposed, we are agreeable to limiting the time of consideration of the amendment by the States to as little as 3 years. We call attention to the fact that when the seventeenth amendment providing for the direct election of United States Senators, and opposed on many of the identical grounds voiced against our proposed amendment, was submitted to the States for ratification on May 13, 1912, the ratification was completed by the 36th ratifying State on April 8, 1913, or less than 11 months after the date of submission. Of the 37 ratifying States, 5 of them were Southern States which at the time had in force under State law poll-tax requirements for voting. The nineteenth amendment, providing suffrage for women, required less than 15 months for adoption.

At the present time only six States—Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia—require the payment of poll tax as a prerequisite for voting. South Carolina, until recently, had a constitutional provision requiring poll tax, but this was repealed by the adoption at the general election last November of a constitutional amendment proposed by the 1950 State legislature. I am advised that the South Carolina Legislature, which is now in session, must approve the action of the electorate in the November election, and that such approval appears to be imminent. For the record I want the Senate to know that the poll-tax requirement was repealed by the State of Florida by legislative action in 1937 at which time I was a member of the State senate and was one of the supporters of the action by which repeal was accomplished.

The poll-tax requirement, now limited to the six States already mentioned, has been accorded far greater importance than it deserves. The fact of the matter is that the amount of poll tax required to be paid in the several States is so small as to impose only a slight economic obstacle for any citizen who desires to qualify to cast a ballot. This requirement operates, of course, equally on citizens of all races and colors and is generally subject to important exemptions which limit its application, such as the exemption of veterans, of women, and of citizens beyond a certain age limit.

Notwithstanding the fact that all cosponsors of this proposed amendment feel that the importance of the poll-tax question has been magnified far beyond its actual effect, it is our feeling that the problem has been so widely discussed and has been so generally regarded as the imposition of an undemocratic handicap on Negro citizens who comprise a minority group in our Nation, that it would be good public policy and in the interest of sounder democratic government to speedily move, through this proposed amendment, to bring a complete end to the imposition of the poll-tax requirement as a condition of participation in Federal elections. The proposed amendment would have no effect whatever upon the election of officials at the State or local level, but would leave this subject, as heretofore, to the discretion and jurisdiction of the several States.

Since there are many good citizens who have indicated their feeling that this subject matter should be dealt with through the passage of a Federal statute rather than through the adoption of a Federal constitutional amendment, we feel that it is proper to call attention to the fact that as shown by the debates on this subject over many years, in both the Senate and House of Representatives, there are many able constitutional lawyers, coming not only from the South but also from all other portions of the Nation, who have always believed and contended that the only legal way to deal with this question, other than through action by the States themselves, is by Federal constitutional amendment, and that action through Federal statute would clearly violate the provisions and requirements of the Federal Constitution under which the qualification of electors, as prescribed under the laws of the several States, is adopted as the qualification of electors to vote upon Federal officials.

The sponsors of the resolution which I have just introduced have very deep convictions on this matter, and I feel that I should say for each and all of us that we regard the Federal Government as without any authority whatsoever to deal with this subject matter except by the submission and ratification of a Federal constitutional amendment.

While this is no time or place for a full statement of the position of the sponsors of the proposed amendment, I feel that it is proper to call brief attention to the following facts which support our conviction:

First. The framers of the original Constitution in 1787 provided for the election of Members of the House of Representatives under section 2 of article I of the original Constitution, part of which reads as follows:

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

At the very time that the original Constitution was being drafted and while it was being considered by the several States there appeared in the constitutions of most of the Original Thirteen States specific requirements for electors of the most numerous branch of their respective legislatures, which requirements were described by the use of the very word "qualifications," which requirements comprised either ownership of property of a stated nature or value or payment of taxes in a stated amount, or payment of poll taxes, specifically named as such. In the case of the State of New Hampshire, under its constitution of 1784, a poll or head tax was specifically required as one of the qualifications for a citizen to vote for a member of the House of Representatives of New Hampshire which was the most numerous branch of the State legislature. It was against such an existing background in 1787 that the members of the Constitutional Convention wrote into our original Constitution the provision of section 2 of article I which I have already mentioned and which adopted as Federal qualifications for electors of Members of the House of Representatives the "qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

Second. In 1912, 125 years after the drafting of the original Constitution, the Congress submitted the seventeenth amendment providing for the direct election of United States Senators. The Congress saw fit at that time to incorporate in the seventeenth amendment and as a part of it the exact words which appear in section 2 of article I of the original Constitution where they apply to the election of Members of the House of Representatives. In other words, in submitting the seventeenth amendment the Congress used, and in ratifying the seventeenth amendment the several States again approved, the specific requirement thus made applicable to Members of the Senate that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." It is, of course, well known to every Member of the Senate that at the time of the submission and ratification of the seventeenth amendment a considerably larger number of States than the six which still preserve the poll tax requirement, not only enforced that requirement but had embodied the same in their several State constitutions as a qualification for voting, which fact was well known to the general public and to the Members of the Sixty-second Congress which submitted the amendment.

Without arguing the matter at greater length at this time, I simply want to restate the fact that the sponsors of the proposed amendment have strong convictions that the Congress is without power to deal effectively with this subject matter through the passage of a Federal statute and that the adoption of such a statute would bring on protracted and unfruitful litigation, long delay, and questionable results. In the event such a statute should ever be upheld by the Supreme Court in the face of what we believe to be its complete unconstitutionality, it is clear that such a ruling would invite the Congress to adopt further provisions affecting the qualification of electors, as for instance provisions affecting the age requirement, the period of residence in the State or county, or both, and other requirements, all of which would seriously impinge upon the rights of the several States to fix these matters of important public policy within their own respective jurisdictions and based on their own experience and judgment.

The introducers of the proposed amendment are exceedingly anxious that it be acted upon speedily and favorably by the Congress so that this subject matter, which has been the source of such long controversy and fruitless debate, and on which both of the political parties are so fully committed, may be quickly submitted to the States where we believe that it will be promptly ratified. We feel that such a conclusion of this long-standing controversy is decidedly in the interest of sound democratic government and stronger unity among all of the people of our Nation. Perhaps the speedy settlement of this issue may lead the way to moderate and clearly legal settlements of other long-standing questions on which we have been long divided and sometimes even bitterly divided.

We are offering this amendment in the hope that it may receive friendly, favorable, and speedy action by the Congress. In the event it appears that this hope cannot be realized, but that the issue will again be subjected to long, protracted, and even bitter debate, we would prefer of course that it be laid aside, as the grave national and international problems which confront our Nation do not justify in our judgment the expenditure of any great time or effort or the indulging in any extended discussion of this subject. These perilous times call, in our opinion, for unity and harmony, and for quick, just, and lawful settlement of domestic controversy where such is reasonably possible. Where not possible we believe that such controversies should be laid aside so that all citizens may unite in the tremendous joint effort which our national and international problems require of us.

AUTHORITY OF THE PRESIDENT TO SEND AMERICAN TROOPS ABROAD

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, several times this afternoon in colloquy I have addressed a question to Senators who have spoken, as to whether or not they were in favor before the Congress has an opportunity to determine the policy, either under the North Atlantic Treaty or under the Constitution, of making commitments of our American boys to be assigned to an integrated international army in Europe.

In his message on the state of the Union the President was silent as to the particular provision which I have just mentioned. However, the news ticker this afternoon carries a purported statement by the President. Of course, as the majority leader well knows, there is always an opportunity for human error. This is what the President is reported to have said this afternoon:

> Over and over again at a news conference, the President said there was no question about the authority of a President to send troops anywhere in the world.
> He said this authority is recognized abundantly throughout the history of this country.
>
> Mr. Truman said, however, that this Government always consults with congressional committees on foreign policy decisions, particularly the Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees.
>
> The only restriction Congress could place on his power to send troops where needed, he said, would necessarily be by restricting appropriations for this purpose.
> And Mr. Truman made it clear that present plans are to supply troops for the united command of General Eisenhower for the defense of the North Atlantic countries.

Mr. President, if that report is true, and I take it to be true, the President for the first time has flatly told the Congress and the American people that he expects to send troops abroad, and, if I correctly interpret the release, the President feels he can do so without coming to the Congress of the United States for it to determine whether or not he has the authority, either under the North Atlantic Treaty or under the Constitution, to take such action.

My reason for mentioning the matter—and I do so with the desire to be constructive, as the majority leader knows—is because I have submitted a resolution on the subject. I did so after I had read headlines in the newspapers saying that commitments had been made. Feeling that the Congress should determine whether American foot soldiers are to be placed in an integrated army in Europe, I submitted a resolution which reads:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no Ground Forces of the United States shall be assigned to duty in European areas for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the formulation of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress.

The resolution asks only one thing; that before any commitment is made or American soldiers are assigned to this integrated army, the President shall permit Congress to determine whether or not we are to follow such a policy. I took the matter up with the majority leader, who has very kindly cooperated. It had been my intention to move or to ask unanimous consent, before the session today ended, that the resolution be made the unfinished business, because I think the issues are now joined. I think Members of Congress will agree on that point. To me this question represents the crux of the whole foreign policy, because our appropriations, our taxes, our allocations in this country—yes, the question of manpower, including even 18 year old boys—will be dependent upon the policy of sending land troops to Europe as a part of an integrated army.

I respectfully call the matter to the attention of the distinguished majority leader, and I hope that after the Senate convenes on Monday as soon as possible after the business of the Senate with respect to organization matters has been concluded, we may determine upon a time when the resolution can come before the Senate and be debated and disposition made of it.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, as has been stated by the minority leader, I told him that I would discuss with him the time for taking up the resolution. However, I also told him that I thought it should have the consideration of a committee. At the proper time I shall move that the resolution be referred to the appropriate committee. I shall also discuss that matter with the minority leader.

Mr. President, I understand that the minority have about completed their committee assignments, but that they are going to have a caucus tomorrow when they will determine whether they will make a motion which will in effect change the Reorganization Act. I had hoped that we could complete the committee organization today. I had hoped, as a matter of fact, that we might have completed it several days ago. But I understand the difficulty in making assignments, and I have wanted to give the members of the minority party every possible consideration. For that reason, Mr. President, I feel that under the circumstances, it being uncertain as to just what will be done, the only thing we can do is to wait until after the caucus has been held, and then there can be presented to the Senate the proposal to be made which will in effect change the Reorganization Act.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I think the RECORD ought to show that, as stated by the majority leader, a conference will be held tomorrow to approve the assignments of Senators on the minority side as proposed by the Committee on Committees. I want the RECORD also to show that, while one can never be sure what a conference may approve, I have no doubt that by noon tomorrow the minority will be able to present its committee assignments for the organization of the Senate, and that we can cooperate with the majority leader in that respect.

Mr. McFARLAND. But the Senator has not given us information as to whether there will be an attempt made in effect to change the Reorganization Act. Of course, we need to have some notice of such a proposal. I would certainly appreciate it if the Senator from Nebraska would communicate with me tomorrow in regard to the action taken by the caucus on that point, so that I can notify Members on this side, in order that we can be ready to proceed to a vote on that question possibly on Monday. The Reorganization Act is regarded as very important by a great many Senators, and they do not want to change it. So, in fairness to them, I feel that they must have at least 24 hours' notice of any effort the caucus may propose to make along that line. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska can communicate with me tomorrow as to what the caucus decides in that regard, without going through the inconvenience of having a session so that the communication can be made on the floor. I will take the responsibility of notifying other Senators as to what the caucus decides.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I can give the distinguished majority leader assurance now that there will not be any attempt made permanently to change the Reorganization Act. That would have to be done by submitting a measure to the Committee on Rules and Administration, on which hearings would be had, and a subsequent report by the committee to the Senate. But I should like to say to the distinguished Senator that we are going to attempt to convince the majority that we need more Republican members on more committees, so as to distribute more equitably the load of work that must be done. I suggest once more to the majority leader that something be done along that line.

Since the majority leader feels that he should have a full attendance of the membership, I believe the thing to do is to take a recess to Monday, and I serve notice now that it is agreeable to us that the committees of the Senate be organized at that time. We are giving more than 24 hours' notice, so the majority leader can prepare for it.

Mr. McFARLAND. Will the Senator from Nebraska kindly communicate with me the decision in regard to what kind of motion will be made after the Republican caucus has been held? Will the Senator be at liberty to do so?

Mr. WHERRY. I myself do not know what will be done. Since the Senator believes he should have a full representation on Monday, or any other day he wants to take up the subject of organization, I think he ought to move a recess until Monday, and I will give him all the information I can in the meantime. I suggest to the Senator, in view of the fact that he desires a full attendance, that I believe it would be best to recess until Monday.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. McFARLAND. I would appreciate it if the Senator would convey to me tomorrow, after the Republican caucus, the nature of the motion which will be made, if it is agreeable to the caucus membership for him to do so.

I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 15, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most merciful and gracious God, whose divine love, wisdom, and power are the inspiration and strength of the God-fearing and the faithful, may we daily go forth courageously in the high adventure of building a finer civilization.

May we begin each day with a vital and radiant faith in the Lord, our God. Make us more eager to seek and more willing to accept the overtures of our Master's counsel and companionship.

Grant that our vision of peace on earth may be so clear and commanding that every lofty and holy aspiration within our souls shall respond with a fervent desire and determination to bring it to fulfillment.

We pray that these Thy servants may be guided by Thy spirit in some special way as they formulate the policies and administer the affairs of government and as they labor for a just and righteous solution of all the difficult problems in the areas of international relationship.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 9, 1951, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

JANUARY 12, 1951.

The honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: A certificate of election in due form of law showing the election of Hon. ERNEST GREENWOOD as a Representative-elect to the Eighty-second Congress from the First Congressional District of the State of New York has been received and is on file in this office.

Respectfully yours,
RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Member-elect will present himself at the bar of the House to receive the oath of office.

Mr. GREENWOOD appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

RESIGNATIONS FROM COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from a committee:

JANUARY 11, 1951.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby resign, as of this date, from the Committee on House Administration.

Sincerely yours,
EDNA F. KELLY.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from a committee:

JANUARY 12, 1951.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby wish to tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives.

Respectfully yours,
PAUL C. JONES,
Member of Congress, Tenth Missouri District.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

ECONOMIC REPORT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 30)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Joint Committee on the Economic Report and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1951.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIRS: I am presenting herewith my Economic Report to the Congress, as required under the Employment Act of 1946.

In preparing this report, I have had the advice and assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers, members of the Cabinet, and heads of independent agencies.

Together with this report, I am transmitting a report, the Annual Economic Review: January 1951, prepared for me by the Council of Economic Advisers in accordance with section 4 (c) (2) of the Employment Act of 1946.

Respectfully,
HARRY S. TRUMAN.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF STATE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 38)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, showing all receipts and disbursements on account of refunds, allowances, and annuities for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950, in connection with the Foreign Service retirement and disability system as required by section 862, Foreign Service Act of 1946 (Public Law 724).

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

The WHITE HOUSE, January 11, 1951.

(Enclosure: Report concerning retirement and disability fund, Foreign Service.)

CONSTRUCTION OF NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on Tuesday, January 16, 1951, to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 1001) to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels, and for other purposes; that there be not to exceed 1 hour of general debate, to be confined to the bill, to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] and myself, after which the bill shall be considered for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when I had the conference with the gentleman from Georgia and suggested to him I would be agreeable to this procedure provided it was in accordance with the desires of the Rules Committee, I had forgotten the fact that the State of Pennsylvania and its 33 Members of the House are vitally interested in an inauguration on that day. They have come to me and suggested they would like to have this matter come up on some other day than Tuesday if that is agreeable.

Mr. VINSON. I suggest that the minority leader fix the time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Wednesday would be satisfactory.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Wednesday will be more preferable.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, then I modify my unanimous-consent request to make the date Wednesday, the 17th.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to the modification, or to the calling up of a bill under unanimous consent, finally, because I realize the Rules Committee has not yet been organized and ready to function. Does this bill contain, may I ask the gentleman, some $2,000,000,000 of authorizations for expansion of the Navy?

Mr. VINSON. The gentleman is correct. It provides for the construction of 171 new ships of war, including a large airplane carrier, and the modernization of some 293 ships already in existence, at an estimated cost of about $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Is this new supercarrier the gentleman referred to being constructed in place of the supercarrier which was voted by the Eightieth Congress?

Mr. VINSON. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that it is not being constructed to take the place of the one that was canceled. It is being constructed as a new ship. It will be only 60,000 tons or less.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. What was the weight of the original carrier?

Mr. VINSON. The one that was canceled was some 68,000 tons.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. What was the cost of that cancellation?

Mr. VINSON. The cost of the carrier that was canceled was estimated at around $189,000,000.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. But what was the cost of the cancellation itself; I understand some $20,000,000, is that right?

Mr. VINSON. I do not have that figure, but I will develop all that in the discussion on the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Well, I am just trying to point out, under my reservation, that we are now building a new carrier, when the administration refused to build a better carrier for less money a year or more ago. The Eightieth Congress authorized it, but the Secretary of Defense of that time canceled that new carrier. The project was abandoned at a cost of some $20,000,000. The new carrier will now cost how much more than the original one?

Mr. VINSON. It is estimated the new carrier will cost $235,000,000; about $45,000,000 more than the one that was canceled.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Then we have lost 18 months of precious time and are spending about $66,000,000 more, while getting a smaller carrier; is that right?

Mr. VINSON. I think the gentleman from Ohio is making his point for the RECORD quite clear.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I feel that point should be made quite clear in view of some of the statements that have been made here and elsewhere relative to the Eightieth Congress. It was not the Congress but the administration which made the $66,000,000 mistake in stopping construction of the original carrier.

Mr. VINSON. I agree with the gentleman, and it will all be cleared up in debate.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, does this new carrier carry out the program that Admiral Denfeld had in mind?

Mr. VINSON. Well, it carries it out partly, as far as the carrier is concerned; yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, why is debate on a $2,000,000,000 bill at this stage in this session limited to 1 hour?

Mr. VINSON. I thought probably being confined to the bill that the Committee on Armed Services could present the facts justifying favorable consideration in that time. I think we can cover the whole thing in 30 minutes a side.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, you still have the 5-minute rule.

Mr. VINSON. You still have the 5-minute rule, of course, and it will be liberal. We do not have anything else before the House at that time, and there will be no desire to speed it through any faster than orderly procedure requires.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman will have no idea of limiting debate under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. VINSON. No. The gentleman can talk all he wants to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

OPERATION CESSPOOL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include several communications.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am today sending a letter to the Honorable CARL VINSON, chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, and requesting that an investigation be undertaken at once to uncover the situation outlined in the letter I will read to the House and to punish those responsible for these difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, the letter I have referred to has been sent to me by a personal friend and one in whom I have the utmost confidence. The situation is so rotten that action should be undertaken at once.

The letter reads as follows:

SOUTH KOREA, December 31, 1950.

DEAR MIKE: It is with some reluctance I write this letter to you, but I suppose whatever I might say won't be exactly news to you.

This has been a "rough drill"—as the boys say—especially that 3 weeks or more up around the Chosen Reservoir. That was the toughest soldiering any of us had ever done. In fact, the whole damned thing was a nightmare.

Mike, you've known me for some time now, and I think you know I don't lie. So help me God, there are some awfully rotten things going on out here, that should be looked into, and someone hung for them.

I am deliberately refraining from comment on the strategical or tactical operations. But—when I see American canned beer, purchased for the Armed Forces, and shipped overseas in Navy ships, being sold in Korean grog shops to our men for $1.25 per can, I can't stomach the situation. Medicinal brandy, the 2-ounce type issued to medical departments, is being sold for 75 cents each. United States whisky is being peddled for $35 a fifth, United States cigarettes, in vast quantities, may be found in any Korean house or shop. We have even had instances of Koreans approaching our camps offering to sell us United States Army issue clothing. It is so obvious that the black market is doing a tremendous business that it leaves us country boys stupefied. I have personally asked various CIC and CID personnel why they don't move in on this "Operation Cesspool"—and they tell me they "can't touch it." It doesn't require a genius to figure out the answer there.

There's not much more I feel like writing, Mike—except that I've never been so disillusioned and disgusted in my whole life. Something is tragically wrong somewhere, and must be rectified in the United States. Our men are bitter—and they are not damned fools, either. They can detect the odor of manure after their noses have been shoved into it a few times.

Best wishes for a happy new year, and I would appreciate a note from you.

Sincerely.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting with my remarks a copy of the letter I am today sending to Chairman VINSON:

JANUARY 12, 1951.

Hon. CARL VINSON,
Chairman, Armed Services Committee,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CARL: I am enclosing a copy of a letter which I have just received from a man in whom I have the utmost respect and confidence. The letter speaks for itself as you can see, and I am herewith making a formal request that you, as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, undertake an investigation of the charges made. The situation described in this letter is so rotten that, in my opinion, something should be done immediately to correct it and I am very hopeful that with your usual good judgment and finesse that you will get to the bottom of this matter at the earliest opportunity, correct the difficulties cited, and see that those responsible for them are punished.

I would appreciate hearing from you about this matter at your earliest convenience, and it is my sincere hope that you will immediately conduct an investigation of the charges made.

With best personal wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MIKE MANSFIELD.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. RABAUT asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes today, following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. SUTTON asked and was given permission to address the House today for 1 hour, following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 hour on Tuesday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

ENLISTMENT OF GERMANS AND JAPANESE IN THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, all people throughout the world are properly disturbed over the prospects of war. Nobody wants war. Everybody wants peace, but not "peace at any price." Most everyone believes the most effective way to maintain an honorable peace is for the free world to build up its armed forces, but America alone cannot supply the manpower and the industrial goods for such an effort. Nor should our boys be called to make all the sacrifices. We should invite the people of other nations to join these forces even though their governments are unable or unwilling to provide armies. This is especially true of the people of Germany and Japan.

The best jobs in these countries are in the United States Army. We should accept enlistments of Germans and of Japanese. We could in this way increase our Armed Forces by probably 2,000,000 men in a minimum of time and at a minimum of expense.

I have heretofore offered legislation to accomplish this. I have today reintroduced a bill for this purpose. I shall from time to time discuss various aspects of the matter with the House.

GIVE THEM HELP OR GET THEM OUT

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, not one of us wants to see a continuation of what is taking place in Korea. Let us give our boys enough help to do the job that is before them, or let us get them out of Korea. We need not—we cannot—fight alone; yet virtually that is what we are doing. There are Chinese who want to help and who are ready to help. There are Japanese who will help if we permit it. Let us stop fighting on the other fellow's terms. Manpower is our need in Asia and a sea of manpower is available to us. Let us use that help. Let us give our boys a better break, or let us get them out. We have already shown that we will fight for principle. Let us not bleed ourselves unnecessarily into exhaustion.

QUADRUPLE AMPUTEES

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, you have all read about the quadruple amputee who is out at Walter Reed Hospital. He has been spoken of in the papers and on the radio. General Streit called me the day before yesterday and told me that letters are pouring in from all over the country with donations for this boy, to try to make his lot a little easier. General Streit has assigned an officer and two secretaries and several women to open the mail that pours in for young Veteran Smith. These donations are chiefly of dimes, quarters, and dollars, small amounts. This shows the feeling of the people all over the country, no matter how moderate their means, for these men. There is nothing we really can do for them except to show our appreciation and make them more comfortable.

I should like to remind the country and the Congress that there are very many terribly wounded men at the Walter Reed. There is another boy at Walter Reed Hospital who is almost equally badly hurt. There is one that is perhaps more severely handicapped. He has given both legs for us. He has given a part of one hand, and he has given a part of one arm. We cannot fit that boy with prosthetic appliances. His plight is even worse than that of some of the others, although people do not realize it because he cannot be fitted with prosthetic appliances.

There were four quadruple amputees in World War II. One of them was Jim Wilson, the boy that came to Washington about legislation. That boy walks and dances and uses both hands. These veterans have a spirit that is beyond compare.

INCOME-TAX EXEMPTION FOR MEMBERS OF MILITARY AND NAVAL FORCES

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, during World War II members of our military and naval forces were given an income-tax exemption of $1,500 of their compensation for active duty service.

Although the President has not admitted the action in Korea to be a war—a "bitter campaign" he called it in his state of the Union message—the effect upon the finances of the participating Armed Forces personnel and their dependents, and upon the economy of the Nation, is just the same.

I am therefore introducing today a bill to exempt from income tax $1,500 of compensation received during any taxable year for active service in the Armed Forces of the United States during a period of war, or a period of declared emergency during which the Armed Forces of the United States are engaged in combat or occupational military operations.

These men, and women, should not, in justice, be called upon to fight those battles and pay for them too.

Mr. Speaker, I trust the bill will be given immediate consideration and unanimous support.

CONSTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS WITH CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House of a matter of deep concern in critical times like these.

Three enormous office buildings are to be erected on what is known as the Golden Triangle at Pittsburgh Pa. The name given to the development is the Gateway.

The sponsors of the project are the Mellon Bank interests, the United States Steel Corp., the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., and the Aluminum Co. of America. This building group is the initial development of this area and the cost of the buildings is estimated at in excess of $100,000,000—60 percent of which is being loaned the above-mentioned group by the Equitable Insurance Co. of New York.

Plans for the three buildings have been under way for some time and the general contract to erect the buildings has been given on a cost-plus basis to Starrett Bros. & Eakin, of New York. At this time caisson footings are being placed for the first building. The plans for the superstructure are not yet completed, but it is the firm intention of the group to use an all-aluminum facing or a combination of aluminum and stainless steel—a development which is entirely new in the construction field. It is obvious that thousands upon thousands of square feet of these critical materials will be utilized for this enterprise—materials which are, at the present writing, highly restricted and vitally necessary to the war effort. These buildings could be faced with orthodox masonry facings immediately available and not at all in short supply, nor of any consequence to the war effort.

I plead with the Committee on Armed Services to look into this matter at once.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, we have had the Wilson war, the Roosevelt war, and are now approaching the Truman war. I assume we will continue to have wars as long as we have Democratic Presidents. However, what disturbs me the most is the fact that we have turned over the direction of our armies in Korea to that debating society called the United Nations. Just recently President Truman stated that he would confer with the United Nations before dropping any atom bombs. On that basis I assume that if Russia were to drop bombs in the United States he would call a meeting of the United Nations and discuss the matter for at least 3 months before deciding whether to retaliate or not.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. MASON asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Monday, January 22, 1951, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore granted, on the subject of Federal taxation.

ADDITIONAL SECRETARIES OF THE ARMY, NAVY, AND AIR FORCE

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, for the past week a subcommittee of the House Committee on Armed Services, of which I am a member, has been taking testimony from representatives of the Reserve Officers Association, the Air Force Association, the AMVETS, the American Legion, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other organizations on the question of the Reserve components of our Defense Establishment.

While I do not want to create the impression that I am reporting for the subcommittee or reflecting its views, yet I do want the membership of the House to know that because of the mishandling of the Reserve program, much hardship has resulted. The uncertainty that each Reserve is faced with today has thrown both officers and men alike of the Army, Navy, Air Reserve, National Guard, Marines, and Coast Guard into a complete tail spin.

Two years ago I called to the attention of Congress these unfavorable conditions among the Reserves and at that time recommended that action be taken immediately by creating additional Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force whose sole responsibility would be to look after the affairs of the Reserve components. My recommendation, which was incorporated in H. R. 1439, introduced in the Eighty-first Congress, was the first step necessary to bring about a complete overhauling of all Reserve activities with the hope of eventually building a strong Reserve force. Unfortunately, the legislation was ignored by the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. Speaker, with the Reserve problem acute today and thousands of reservists being called to active duty, it is incumbent upon this Congress to take immediate action in remedying conditions. With this thought in mind, I have reintroduced my bill to create additional Secretaries for the Reserve components of our Military Establishment. I hope that it will receive favorable consideration.

FIVE-PERCENT OPERATORS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, it has been just 11 days since Congress approved the second supplemental appropriation bill authorizing more billions for defense. Already the 5-percenters have begun their nefarious activities to get a part of it.

Therefore, I have introduced in this Congress a bill similar to one which was proposed by me in 1949. This bill, H. R. 485, would require persons who, for a fee, engage to obtain Government contracts for business firms to register with the Congress.

These 5-percenters are already flocking to Washington to fleece the unsuspecting small-business men who come here from all parts of the country to try to get Government defense contracts. Too many small-business men, after the unsavory situation revealed by the Senate Investigating Committee with reference to the activities of certain administration favorites, have come to believe that the only means of obtaining Government business for their plants is through one of these influence peddlers.

This situation must be corrected at once, before our defense funds, obtained from the toil of our taxpayers, are needlessly dissipated and go to line the pockets of these slick operators.

Already, a carpenter contractor of my district in modest circumstances has written that he has paid traveling expenses amounting to $750 to someone posing as being connected with a fictitious organization called the Atomic Bomb Proof Shelter Division. He represented himself as being able to produce Government contracts for which he stated his charge would be 5 percent of the net profits. Having advanced the money for traveling expenses, the carpenter has heard nothing further from him.

Of course, some influence peddlers are not that flagrant. Some merely charge exorbitantly to obtain contracts which in most cases could have been acquired through legitimate dealings with the Government department involved. The State of New York and, no doubt, other States have established offices in Washington, staffed by experienced personnel, to assist business concerns which do not maintain Washington offices in their dealings with the labyrinthian Government departments. They stand ready to help at any time without charge or obligation.

However these 5-percenters operate, their activities must be curbed at once. Unfortunately, as the excellent Senate committee report admitted, it is the practical fact that they cannot be stopped entirely, but some of the most vicious abuses can be curtailed by the passage of legislation, followed by vigorous enforcement.

I believe that my bill, if enacted, would tend to eliminate the irresponsible sharpshooters and racketeers by exposing their dealings to the light of day. Under it anyone who accepts or obtains a commission for rendering assistance in getting Government contracts is forced to register with the Congress. If he is a legitimate operator, and there are some who perform a valuable service, he would not hesitate to register. Those with venal motives to extort funds from the unsuspecting would be more likely to hesitate, if they were required thus to record officially the nature of their retainer.

In the present mobilization effort, this is a matter of urgency in order, first, to stop the victimizing of innocent small-business men; second, to insure that defense contracts are let on an honest, nonpolitical foundation of merit in the contractor and his product; and third, to prevent a complete undermining of confidence in our Government and those directing its procurement policies.

TRIBUTE TO DOC WATKINS

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, today marks the end of a long and distinguished career of an outstanding member of the reportorial staff of the Associated Press. Doc Watkins is retiring today after more than 40 years as a member of that fine organization. He has handled Associated Press work for the Northwest region of the United States for a long time. He is a personal friend of all Members of Congress from that area. He was conscientious in his work, and accurate and factual in his reporting. He is loved and respected by all those who have associated with him. I know that all of us wish him continued good health and happiness in his retirement, and thank him for the fine work he has done during his long and distinguished service.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

INSPECTION OF FORT KNOX GOLD

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, on October 5, 1949, I presented a resolution to this body requesting that a select committee be chosen to inspect the gold at Fort Knox. There has never been anything done about this, and it seems to me, with all the billions of dollars that we appropriate in Congress, we ought to know how secure our gold reserve is.

I am sure if a medical doctor was ever brought in here he would find that most of the Members of the House have "billionitis," because all we hear in monetary terms is that of billions of dollars.

Further, I will be glad to withdraw this resolution at any time any Member of the House or any Member of the Senate can tell me that he personally has inspected the gold at Fort Knox.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

NOW IS THE TIME FOR MORE REVERENCE AND RESPECT FOR THE AMERICAN FLAG

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, when the Philippine Islands were under attack by the Japanese, a suggestion was made to Gen. Douglas MacArthur that the Stars and Stripes should be hauled down from the headquarters building of the Far Eastern Command in Manila in order to avoid identifying it to Japanese bombers.

The general's historic reply was:

Take every other normal precaution for the protection of Army headquarters, but keep the flag flying.

With this statement General MacArthur expressed again that respect and esteem which loyal Americans have held for Old Glory since the United States was created out of the sacrifice of a bloody revolution.

The fighting men of America have followed the Stars and Stripes into battle in the defense of our Nation whenever danger threatened America. The flag waved from the masthead of the Constitution—Old Ironsides—when naval history was made. It flew proudly over the Bon Homme Richard in the Mediterranean. It moved defiantly above the carrier Lexington as that valiant vessel plunged to a watery grave in the Coral Sea.

Old Glory flew from Fort McHenry at Baltimore in the War of 1812 during the battle which gave birth to our National Anthem. The flag waved from Cemetery Ridge for three bloody days in the Battle of Gettysburg. It stood beside Custer at Little Big Horn. It charged up San Juan Hill with the great Teddy Roosevelt and the Rough Riders. Old Glory moved with American troops through Belleau Woods and in the action at Chateau-Thierry. And our flag was carried with the American forces from Pearl Harbon to Tokyo, from North Africa to Sicily, from the beachhead at Normandy to Berlin.

Never before in our history have we needed a Nation-wide surge of old-fashioned patriotism as we do today. Our Nation is in danger both from forces within as well as from international communism abroad. And there is no more effective way to bring to mind this need than through an increased display of the American flag.

The flag should wave from every flagpole in the United States, a constant reminder to every citizen of the blessings of liberty and freedom that are our heritage. Our flag floating free in the breeze will help awaken the American people to the increasing danger of the growing subversive forces and influences that are undermining our national life, and which, if not checked, will inevitably lead to disastrous results.

The American flag has always been a sacred symbol to citizens of this Nation. Since 1892, for more than half a century, each generation of American children have solemnly repeated the American pledge of "allegiance to the flag of the United States of America and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." During more than half a century this affirmation has been a part of the ritual of American citizenship.

To encourage the display of the American flag from every flagpole in the United States for the inspiration of every citizen as a reminder that the price of freedom is eternal vigilance, I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the flag of the United States should be displayed on buildings of States, counties, cities, and municipalities, and on privately owned buildings to the same extent as on buildings of the Federal Government and in accordance with applicable rules and customs pertaining to the display of the flag of the United States set forth in the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to codify and emphasize existing rules and customs pertaining to the display and use of the flag of the United States of America," approved June 22, 1942, as amended.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Monday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes on Monday and Tuesday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, a vast number of the 2,000,000 Federal civil-service employees have at one time been employed in private industry. Many so employed were under covered employment as defined in the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Act, and as a result had regular deductions made from their weekly or monthly pay checks. Such social-security payroll deductions, a 1 percent tax in the past and a 1½ percent tax now are lost for all practical purposes under existing law when such persons are no longer employed in occupations covered by the Social Security Act.

All civilian employees of the Federal Government qualify for retirement benefits under the Civil Service Retirement Act of 1950, as amended, by contributing 6 percent of their wages to the reserve fund. It would seem desirable as well as feasible to permit Federal employees to receive a credit from their social-security payroll deductions toward their civil-service retirement account. Obviously it seems inequitable to have their social-security payroll deductions lost by reason of the fact that there has been simply a transfer of employment from private industry to a Federal job. There is no apparent basis for objection to this bookkeeping transaction which would merely amount to a totaling of payroll taxes paid to the Federal Government and the transfer of that credit to the individual Federal employees' civil-service retirement account.

I am introducing legislation today which should remedy this situation. The bill provides that the tax on wages under section 1400 of the Internal Revenue Code may at the option of the individual be credited to his account in the civil-service retirement and disability fund. The amount to be transferred for civil-service retirement is, of course, limited to the aggregate amount of the tax so deducted under the social-security program.

It is nearly impossible at this time to estimate the number of Federal employees who would be affected by this proposal, but from my investigations to date there should be no adverse effect from the enactment of such a proposal on either of the retirement programs. The Federal Government has the money in either case. If the credit to the civil-service retirement program is not permitted, the social-security program is reaping an unwarranted harvest or windfall at the expense of the individual. If the transfer or credit is allowed, the soundness of the civil-service program is not upset for the Federal employee is permitted to acquire only additional benefits up to the aggregate amount previously deducted under social security.

COMPOSITION OF VARIOUS COMMITTEES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 60) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That during the Eighty-second Congress the Committee on Agriculture shall be composed of 30 members;

The Committee on Appropriations shall be composed of 50 members;

The Committee on Armed Services shall be composed of 35 members;

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments shall be composed of 27 members;

The Committee on Foreign Affairs shall be composed of 27 members;

The Committee on House Administration shall be composed of 23 members;

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce shall be composed of 30 members;

The Committee on the Judiciary shall be composed of 29 members;

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries shall be composed of 27 members;

The Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall be composed of 23 members;

The Committee on Public Lands shall be composed of 27 members; and

The Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall be composed of 23 members.

. The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman will state it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, what is the status of the resolution that was just introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. It has just been agreed to.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I did not hear any request to pass it, and I was on my feet before it was passed to ask a question. What are my rights in the matter? I would like very much to speak on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman might have reserved the right to object at the proper time, but it is too late now.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It was put through before I heard it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was read fully and consisted of a whole page. I think the gentlewoman is too late to raise any question now.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman has already proceeded for 1 minute.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not recognize the gentlewoman from Massachusetts for that purpose at this time.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an excerpt from a publication on public speaking, also to include a speech I made in the House in 1940 on Thomas Alva Edison.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

THE SENDING OF YOUNG AMERICANS ABROAD

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the press of last night tells us that General Marshall and Anna Rosenberg are formulating plans to take some millions—I do not recall whether it is 5 or 6, or whether it went up to the number mentioned by Mr. Dewey, 9 or 10—young Americans and send them abroad.

I wonder if Mrs. Rosenberg has a plan, and if so, if she will tell us how she is going to work it, to replace those young Americans with displaced persons from abroad. There will be vacancies over here when many of those young men do not come back. Our folks would like to know whether she intends to bring over displaced persons to replace the American boys who never come back. That is about the procedure that was followed before. Just who is Anna Rosenberg that she should be selected to tell American mothers when and where and for what their sons should give up their lives?

Mr. RANKIN. Being one of them, I do not think she will.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman will state it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. When I spoke previously, it really was a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Will the Speaker recognize me to speak for 1 minute now?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentlewoman spoken for 1 minute this morning?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. No. I submitted a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman may proceed.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply shocked at the reduction of members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. The committee has now been cut from 27 members to 23. There are under this plan only two committees of the House that have fewer members than the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. I think, in fact, I know what the effect on the people of the country will be. We are in the most horrible, most devastating, most cruel war that this country ever fought and to reduce this committee to only 23 members to my mind is appalling and entirely unjust.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to yield. I do not think the gentleman had anything to do with this.

Mr. RANKIN. I knew nothing about it until it was reported. But, the most unjust thing is this. They did all the cutting on the Democratic side. They took off 4 Democrats, from 17 to 13, and left the Republicans at 10 as in the last Congress.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. We have increased representation on the Republican membership side of the House, however. We should have greater representation than we had in the last session of Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. Not to that extent.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Perhaps not. But it is the principle of the thing when we have more work to do than ever before. It makes a minor committee of the great Committee on Veterans' Affairs. It treats the veterans with disrespect at a time when we should treat them with especial respect.

Mr. Speaker, when the Legislation Reorganization Act of 1946 was enacted, rule X set forth the number of Representatives each committee should have. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs was assigned 27 members, and it has operated satisfactorily with that number ever since its organization.

The resolution which has been presented reduces the number of members to 23—and I cannot find anyone who can tell me the reason for such a drastic change. The powers of the committee have not been lessened in any way that I can discover. Certainly the workload has not been lessened. Every Member of this House who has served upon the committee on Veterans' Affairs knows that such service is not easy. In the Congress just adjourned more than 600 measures were referred to it for consideration, and there is no reason to expect that the number of bills affecting veterans will be any fewer in number in the days ahead.

Service upon the Committee on Veterans' Affairs is a service of sacrifice and devotion to a cause. Sometimes it is tedious, technical work, but it is work that must be done. I have always been a little disappointed in noting the large number of changes in the membership of the committee, and can lay it only at the door of reluctance to devote one's time to a field of endeavor that does not primarily affect one's own district.

I regret exceedingly the move to reduce the standing of this committee. The millions of war veterans of all wars will look upon it as another evidence of the lack of interest in their well-being.

WEST GERMANS VOTE "NO ARMING" IN POLL

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, without any comment on my part at this time I would just like to read to you a short article appearing in the Washington Post under date of December 25, 1950, by the Associated Press:

A magazine's poll of its German readers showed today that a large majority opposes West German rearmament.

Der Spiegel (the Mirror), an independent weekly news magazine, said 33,000 Germans answered its questionnaire. The results were published as the western allies and the West German Government were negotiating terms under which West Germany might agree to contribute troops to aid in a united defense of Western Europe.

Eighty-five percent said they do not want to become soldiers or to have their close relatives become soldiers. Only 12.8 percent answered "Yes."

Opposing the creation of voluntary troop units were 60.8 percent, while 82.6 percent voted against compulsory military service. Only 35.4 percent favor voluntary troops and 15.8 compulsory service.

An overwhelming percentage, 95.5, opposed accepting the plan proposed by France to restrict any German troops raised to small units with no general staff and no war ministry. Even if West Germany were given full equality with other nations in a European army, 68.4 percent would still oppose German rearmament.

On the question of whether West Germany should join the North Atlantic defense pact, 81.5 percent said "No."

SECOND LT. JOE BARTLETT

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday here in the Capitol there was an auspicious ceremony which may have escaped the attention of many of the Members. Yesterday our chief page on this side of the aisle, Joe Bartlett, was sworn into the Marine Corps Reserve as a second lieutenant. Those of us who have come to know and admire Joe, his ready smile, his willingness to be helpful at all times, are delighted to hear of his good fortune, and we know that he will take to the Marine Corps the same qualities that have endeared him to all of us here on the floor of the House.

Our best wishes go with Joe wherever he is and in whatever he may be doing. Our loss will be the gain of the Marine Corps.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I take this time for the purpose of asking the majority leader if he can, in any way, advise us of the program for the following week.

Mr. McCORMACK. The only legislation for next week that I can advise the House of is the naval ship-construction bill to come up on next Wednesday. Any other legislation that might come up next week, and I know of none, except it comes out of the Committee on Armed Services, because they work pretty quick and they have been able to get in some advance work by reason of the organization of the committee at the outset of the session, will come from that committee. I know of no other legislation for next week, but I would like to have a reservation so that I may keep faith with the Members of the House. If any is scheduled to come up, I will advise the House as quickly as I can so that Members may have as much advance notice as possible. I wish I could be more definite.

Mr. ARENDS. I think we understand the situation. I thank the gentleman.

OUR NATION'S INDUSTRIAL STRENGTH

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in considering the grave situation that confronts this country, many of us are inclined to overlook the industrial strength of this Nation.

Never before has industry of this country been in a better position to produce for defense and domestic consumption purposes. And plans for expansion of productivity capacity are the greatest this year of any in our history.

At the start of World War II, according to the reliable Whaley-Eaton News Letter, the value of industrial plants, after depreciation, was around $30,000,000,000. During World War II, the Government invested $18,000,000,000, and private industry another $6,000,000,000. Since 1945, nearly $100,000,000,000 has gone into new plants, equipment, and facilities. Capacities of basic industries range from 40 percent to several hundred percent above prewar. Moreover, this is capacity now in use, and this requires less costly conversion than idle plants. And private industry is prepared to continue expansion programs indefinitely at peak postwar rates.

The Government's program is geared to encourage industrial expansion to meet the new needs of the present situation. Industry has been assured of priorities to complete expansion programs underway and needed expansion by specific industries will receive the same consideration, with Government loans where private capital cannot be obtained.

One of our problems will be to obtain the basic materials to permit the use of the new plant capacity. That is being attacked intelligently.

For those of us who doubt the strength industrially of this Nation, I cite the following article in the New York Times of Sunday, January 7, 1951, by Hartley W. Barclay, one of its leading financial and industrial writers:

United States industry started the largest expansion program in its history last week as 1951 budgets were put into use by manufacturing, mining, transportation, power, and communications companies throughout the country. The assurance of success was given to expansion steps essential to national defense by the announcement of the National Production Authority that such projects would get all the steel and steel products they might need to complete current programs.

EXPANSION OPERATIONS UP 10 PERCENT

For the first week in January, general levels of industrial expansion operations were up on an average of 10 percent above those at the opening of 1950. Price advances, being reflected in costs, were generally up about 5 percent or more above levels of last midsummer, when much of current work was in the planning stages.

Preparations were also under way for a final drive for all-out production of civilian materials and products in the remaining weeks before stern cut-backs come.

In closed sessions of industrial executive groups in individual companies here, sales and marketing executives were ordered by the highest company officials to enter all possible orders as early as possible, from all kinds of customers, on items not essential to national defense. On defense items affected by current or expected cut-back rulings, salesmen were told to book as much "defense order" or "D. O." business as could be obtained.

As a result of such activities, some companies found themselves sold out for the first month, and in some cases for the first quarter, as the week closed. Others, unable to accept any additional orders, prepared budget data to show Washington why further new plant expansion programs should be approved immediately.

The remarkable aspect of these facts, according to analysts, is that much of the most important work of plant expansion has not yet been announced, approved by industry, or put up to the Washington officials.

For example, many plant expansions needed for production of basic chemicals, not yet classed as essential to national defense, have no priority status for obtaining materials, steel, or equipment. Now these chemical industry executives are seeking prompt recognition of their importance by the highest governmental executives.

SOME BUDGETS REVISED

In industries now provided with some priority status, budgets were being revised to provide for all possible absorption of higher costs for many essential raw materials. Experiences of executives who have conferred with NPA and Economic Stabilization Authority officials on price problems created strong feelings of confidence that all sound decisions about budgets and prices eventually would be approved in Washington.

Top officials in key industries said on Friday that "never before" had they experienced such a marked degree of understanding between Government and business, on appreciation of mutual problems.

It became clearer, at the end of the week, that President Truman was putting it up to industry to make the "guns and butter" program succeed. Important steps were taken, but have not yet been announced, further to expand supplies of scarce materials, to reactivate plants and mines now in mothball status, and to put administration of these operations in the hands of industrial, and not politically appointed, personnel.

The result is that industrialists are starting to use Government and industry cooperation as a dual weapon—for fighting inflation on the home front and for providing adequate arms for defense on foreign fronts. In some cases, this has meant setting up more flexible budget features, to provide for industrial expansions instead of for cut-backs previously expected. That is the explanation of the wave of new plant expansion announcements which occurred here last week.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 61) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the following-named Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on Agriculture: Harold D. Cooley, chairman, North Carolina; W. R. Poage, Texas; George M. Grant, Alabama; E. C. Gathings, Arkansas; John L. McMillan, South Carolina; Thomas G. Abernethy, Mississippi; Carl Albert, Oklahoma; Watkins M. Abbitt, Virginia; James G. Polk, Ohio; Pat Sutton, Tennessee; James F. Lind, Pennsylvania: W. M. (Don) Wheeler, Georgia; Clark W. Thompson, Texas; Paul C. Jones, Missouri; A. S. (Syd) Herlong, Jr., Florida; Eugene J. McCarthy, Minnesota; Harold A. (Porque) Patten, Arizona; E. L. (Bob) Bartlett, Alaska; Antonio Fernós-Isern, Puerto Rico.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

TELEVISING AND BROADCASTING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a resolution to amend rule XXXV of the Rules of the House of Representatives to provide for televising and broadcasting the sessions of the House. It is my intention that this shall apply only to major debates on major issues.

The resolution suggested itself to me following the extremely successful television coverage of the debates of the Security Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations at their current sessions. People responded enthusiastically to the face-to-face coverage which was given in this way. It brought into the homes of millions of Americans a personal relationship to the United Nations and an understanding of the points of view and the problems considered which was invaluable. This coverage took place at the height of the debate between Vishinsky, Malik, and other representatives of the Soviet bloc, and Senator Austin, Senator Sparkman, Senator Lodge, Mr. Dulles, and Ambassador Gross, on the issues raised by the aggressions of the North Korean and Communist Chinese against South Korea.

Mr. Speaker, the coming sessions of the House of Representatives are likely to produce debates regarding America's role in leading the defense of the free peoples against the totalitarian challenge of the Soviet bloc which will determine the fate of world peace and the destiny of our country for centuries to come. The people should have the most effective means which modern science can make available for personally seeing and hearing these debates, and this means the full use of television and radio.

I have discussed this project with the leading television and radio broadcasters in the East, the National Broadcasting Co., CBS, American, Mutual, and Dumont. Those are the principal networks. They all agree, and they have authorized me to state that they will give coverage to the principal debates of the House, if permitted to do so. They point out that coverage of the Security Council and General Assembly of the United Nations ranged between 1 hour to several hours a day, even covering certain of the sessions in full, with the most enthusiastic audience reponse, despite the protracted nature of these broadcasts.

Television coverage is now very wide, as there are 109 television broadcasting stations, covering the major cities of the United States, with a few exceptions in the Mountain States and the Southwest States. There are 10,000,000 television receivers in the United States today, and the monthly sales continue at the rate of about 750,000 additional television receivers. To this network should be added the over 3,000 AM and FM broadcasting stations, reaching practically every one of the 45,000,000 American families.

I would like to tell the Members that I have just had a survey made, which I am going to release in connection with my reintroduction of a resolution to find out why less than 50 percent of Americans vote, and that survey shows that 37 percent of the people who wrote, said that they did not know the candidates and therefore they did not vote. Here is one way in which men who are in the House can get known to their constituents in a very graphic way.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize that the practical effect of the resolution I am introducing is to open the subject for discussion, because it continues powers which the Speaker has under rule XXXV, which gives him complete direction and control of any television broadcast of the sessions, even if my resolution should be passed. In point of fact, the Speaker could probably permit such television broadcasting anyhow, as he does today, on the occasion of delivery by the President of his annual message to the Congress in joint session, but knowing the great fairness of the Speaker, I judge he would want an expression of the House before exercising that authority.

In a sense, we would really be using the scientific advance of television to expand the size of the gallery of the House, to which the people are today invited as the guests of the House, and make that gallery country-wide.

I hope very much that Members will feel that my suggestion, and I emphasize that it is a suggestion, is designed to make the individual's discharge of his duty more gratifying and productive, and that my suggestion will be considered in this light. I wish to emphasize, too, my profound regard for the Speaker, and to pay a tribute to the great fairness with which his authority is exercised.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. It seems to me that if the United Nations is being televised, the Congress of the United States ought to be. I think the gentleman's proposal is an excellent one, and I would like to see it passed. I would say, however, that I notice the gentleman limits it to some of the major debates. I think it would only be fair to have all sessions of the Congress televised.

Mr. JAVITS. May I say that as a practical matter I do not think the television companies would do that? Further, I think this, that there is something to the fact that you do not want a snooping camera. You want a camera with a purpose to bring debates of importance to the people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LYLE). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. POTTER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

BIPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, Monday the President of the United States in his state of the Union message called for unity. He is to be commended for citing that unity does not forestall constructive criticism—that unity does not mean closing debate where differences of opinion can be aired. However, there are many people who believe that you can only have unity by repressing expressions from people who have different points of view. Unless unity is based on sound principles and realistic implementation, it is arrogant and superficial.

During these trying times it certainly is desirable for our Government to express the will of the majority of its people—that is the best way to have unity. If my mail is any indication, the majority of the American people have lost confidence in many of the policy makers within the administration—particularly in the State Department. Unity can only be realized when these individuals have been replaced by men in whom the people have the utmost confidence. Then, and only then, will true unity exist. There is a feeling among many people that differences in philosophy concerning our foreign policy should be treated entirely different from our domestic policy. There is no more reason, Mr. Speaker, for a so-called bipartisan foreign policy than there is for a bipartisan domestic policy. We all know that a majority of the domestic legislation dealt with by the Congress is not partisan in nature. The same should hold true when we consider our foreign policy. A deviation in domestic policy is never challenged on the grounds that we are destroying its bipartisan nature and the same should be true in deviation from the administration's foreign policy. But somehow the idea has been fostered in the United States that our foreign policy is different, that it is comprehensive and complex and hence a matter solely to be formulated by the experts within the administration.

It is unfortunate when the country is faced with a great emergency that when policies are scrutinized, in an effort to determine where mistakes have been made in the past, and what course we will follow in the future, that those people who take a different view from the administration are labeled as obstructionists to our defense effort. It was the great Democrat, President Woodrow Wilson, who said:

> You do not need less criticism in time of war, but more. It is hoped that criticism will be constructive, but better unfair attack than autocratic repression. Honesty and competence require no shield of secrecy.

These words of Wilson are as sound today as when he uttered them.

Mr. Speaker, the Eighty-second Congress, which is now in its swaddling clothes, will have to make many important decisions during the next 2 years—decisions which will affect not only the institutions and the freedoms of the United States but which may well determine for all time whether freedom throughout the world will have to give way to the forces of international communism. Such decisions will not be easy to make. There is a variance of opinion, not only here in Washington but throughout the country, as to what our policies should or should not be. Since June 25 last, Mr. Speaker, American boys have been fighting and dying in Korea. We, as a Nation, have suffered in Korea one of the greatest disasters in our military history. Reports have come to us, that contrary to our military tradition, our soldiers are not fighting with the will that has typified them in other engagements. This, Mr. Speaker, is not due to lack of bravery nor intestinal fortitude on their part, but as Americans they must know for what they are fighting. Not only is it necessary for our fighting men in Korea to know their objectives, but every American today is asking this question, What are we trying to do in Korea? People are confused, they know that our Constitution provides that only the Congress shall declare war. But Congress has had no say in committing our troops to Korea.

We are fighting under orders from the United Nations as a United Nations force. Yet, the same United Nations which committed our troops to Korea still is reluctant to cite the Chinese Communists, their own enemy, as aggressors. Possibly one reason the United Nations is reluctant to do so is because the 53 nations which signed the resolution on Korea are not making proportionate sacrifices.

The latest reports we have on combat troops in Korea under the United Nations flag list this breakdown:

The United States	150,000
South Korea	100,000
England	10,000
Turkey	4,000
Australia	1,500
France	1,400
Canada	1,200
Philippine Islands	1,200
Siam	1,200
Belgium	1,000
New Zealand	900
Greece	800
Netherlands	600

No other member countries of the 53 which signed the Korea resolution have furnished ground forces for the war in Korea. Some have given token naval and air support. The great country of India, with the third largest population in the world, has favored the United Nations' forces with a medical unit as has Sweden. The 24,300 men actually sent to MacArthur by the foregoing nations number less than half of the casualties the United States has suffered to date. It is pitiful that the members of the United Nations, who committed our troops into fighting Communist aggression in Asia, oppose the imposition of political and economic embargoes against Communist China. Many of these same countries are still trading with Communist China in essential war materials. The American people are bitter and disgusted over the episode of the Security Council's inviting representatives of the Chinese Communist government to New York merely to denounce the United States as the aggressor. The United Nations is failing pitifully in meeting its responsibilities. It will continue to do so until the Soviet Union and its satellites are expelled from the United Nations. It is inconceivable to me why we should continue to allow a Trojan horse within our boundaries when Communist troops are shooting down our men in Korea. Russia has never been a bona fide member in principle of the United Nations and has used her seat to perpetrate propaganda warfare against us. If we are to save the day, let us kick out the Trojan horse.

Our men today in Korea are tragically outnumbered with no hope of sufficient reinforcements, and to regain ground lost will take at least a couple of years. Our military advisers tell us that Korea is of little strategic importance from a military standpoint. But assuming that Korea is of strategic military importance and say that we are in a position to hold a beachhead in Korea against onslaughts of the enemy, what is to be gained by continuing to sacrifice American lives simply to hold a beachhead? There is only one conceivable reason for not removing our troops from Korea, and that is to divert and contain Communist troops to that area. But if we are to utilize that advantage, certainly they should take the handcuffs off Chiang Kai-shek's Chinese forces on Formosa, equip and allow them to invade the mainland of China as Chiang has requested permission to do. With the concentration of Chinese forces on the peninsula of Korea, and the other concentration of Chinese Communist forces on the French Indochina border, it is conceivably possible for the Nationalist Chinese to gain a substantial foothold in southern and central China. Authentic reports have come to us that there are probably a million and a half trained guerrillas within China who will fight on our side if they are encouraged and given arms. We should do everything possible to utilize these groups to our advantage, thereby turning into a civil war what may otherwise develop into global conflict.

It is stupidity of the first order for us to continue to absorb the punishment as we are doing in Korea and not take advantage of the only trained anti-Communist troops of any size in Asia who have the will and the organization to fight. I realize by taking the handcuffs off the Nationalist forces on Formosa that Messrs. Truman, Acheson, and Marshall will be losing face. Fifty thousand American casualties in Korea is a mighty stiff price to pay for "operation face lifting."

All patriotic Americans recognize that international communism is a threat to our security, and they are willing to fight for freedom rather than either appease or accept communism. But we must not let our emotions get the best of our common sense. We must face facts as they are—not as we would like them to be. I think it behooves all of us to analyze our international position today in the face of present realities. First, we must have an objective. It is not enough to say that we are fighting communism, but we must have some immediate objectives as to how far we are going to go and how we are going to do it.

The President in his state-of-the-Union message Monday cited the advantage we have in resources over our enemy. The one resource—and an essential one if defense is dependent in large measure on land armies—that the President failed to mention, where that advantage does not hold true, is manpower. Being an ex-doughboy, it is difficult for me to confess that we should not, and cannot, engage Communist attacks on the ground. That is where Russia and her satellites are the strongest. If we continue our present policy of endeavoring to contain communism within its present borders with ground troops and meet ground attacks wherever they might occur in friction areas, we will dissipate our strength and eventually destroy ourselves. If Russia desires—and I do not doubt but that she does—to bring Western Europe under her sphere of influence, the only deterrent to an act of that kind, since the end of World War II, has been our possession of the atom bomb and our ability to deliver it. That advantage is still ours today. This does not mean, however, that ground troops will not be needed, but they should assume a secondary position rather than the first line of defense as is now the case and as is contemplated.

I am firmly convinced that rather than encouraging the cosigners of the Atlantic Pact to build up large land armies, that it would be more to the advantage of our mutual security if we aided them in developing and expanding their air power, particularly fighter groups and developing bases not only for their but our use. Ground troops, of course, will be necessary in substantial numbers to protect such bases. However, there is a considerable difference between building up land armies as a first line of defense and training ground soldiers for defense of air installations which should be our first line of defense.

We should make it plain to the members of the Atlantic Pact nations that, while we are willing to do everything possible to assist in building up their defenses and recognize an attack on them is an attack on our own security, they must show they themselves have the will and determination to stand up and be counted. This will mean Atlantic Pact countries will have to show us by action what they can contribute toward the mutual defense effort. If they are timid and lack the will to fight, any amount of aid we give them would be wasted and a sense of false security would be our only harvest. It was Daniel Webster who said back in 1834:

> God grants liberty only to those who love it and are always willing to guard and defend it.

Again I say, the members of the Atlantic Pact countries must be firmly given to understand that the United States cannot, and will not continue to furnish money, arms, and also men unless they are willing to make similar sacrifices for collective security. I say it is up to them to act, and if their action does not show a determination to make an all-out effort, then it would be utter stupidity to continue to rely on them.

It is my hope when General Eisenhower completes his tour of the Atlantic Pact nations that he will come back and report to Congress on the display of cooperation manifested by these nations. Congress should make the decision, based upon information reported to it by General Eisenhower—and other information that might be available—as to what we can and should do to expedite the defense program of the Atlantic Pact nations. Congress should decide whether we can, and should, send ground troops to Europe.

I am wondering, after our experience in Korea, what the attitude would be of the Western European nations, who have a larger population than does the United States, if we asked them to send ground troops to Alaska to help us protect that vital area. Many people today believe that Alaska is just as vulnerable to attack as Western Europe. Mutual aid for security purposes has been a one-way street.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to have any hope of containing the tide of communism, it is necessary for us to utilize every anti-Communist country in the world. This means, Mr. Speaker, that we should immediately use our influence to bring Spain into the family of United Nations, and certainly a member of the Atlantic Pact nations. Spain not only has proven herself as being an anti-Communist government, but she holds a strategic position in Europe. He who controls Spain controls the Mediterranean. That means also, Mr. Speaker, that we should use our influence immediately to rearm both Western Germany and Japan. It is a known fact that the Germans possess some of the best military know-how in Europe, and in Japan we have a million and a half trained men who would fight against Communist aggression. Russia has always been a potential enemy of Japan. Certainly no one here in Congress would be afraid of rearming Germany or Japan. They are not in a position to challenge our security by being armed. That is the only way they will be able to protect themselves against attack. If Japan should be attacked today, we would have to send our men to Japan to protect her while her trained men would be unorganized and unarmed. We should use our influence to change the Japanese Constitution so as to allow them to build up a military arm.

Yes, my colleagues, the greatest material weapon we have, and the greatest contribution we can make to freedom-loving people of the world is to build up our already mighty Air Force, reconstruct a mighty Navy, and expand our efforts to sow seeds of discontent in the homes behind the iron curtain by realistic propaganda which reveals communism for what it is as compared to life in a free society. When that has been done, we then should give full warning to Russia that any further acts of aggression by Communist forces—whether they be in Asia or in Europe—will be met by our greatest weapon—our power to retaliate by plane and bomb, and any such retaliation will be in the country of the master switchman.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the President to realize the urgency that exists. I appeal to him to use the powers he now has to speed up our mobilization program. The people are becoming impatient with the lagging in our military production and with his failure to invoke over-all controls to halt our present run-away inflation. If the inflationary trend is not checked, and checked promptly, our economy will be even more seriously dislocated than it is at this time with the result our war effort will be greatly hampered.

I hope we have learned our lesson, Mr. Speaker, and will use the same practical firmness in our diplomatic dealings that is necessary in a military operation. To quote Basil O'Connor:

> The world cannot continue to wage war like physical giants and seek peace like international puppies.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POTTER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I wish to compliment the gentleman upon his splendid address. I only wish that the administration would study very carefully the recommendations made by the gentleman from Michigan, who has first-hand knowledge of what war really is.

Mr. POTTER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POTTER. I yield to the able gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman feel that the retention of Secretary Acheson is leading to national disunity?

Mr. POTTER. As I stated in the body of my speech, if my mail is any indication, the Secretary of State does not have the confidence of the people. I believe the confidence of the people is necessary if we are to have unity. Therefore, it would be a great service to the country if Secretary of State Acheson were removed.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. My mail indicates the same feeling.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POTTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I want to express on my own behalf and that of my colleagues the gratitude of the House for the penetrating and thoughtful analysis of the world situation which the gentleman from Michigan has given us. I feel sure that it is very helpful to us in our attempt to arrive at a conclusion which will be in the best interests of our country.

Mr. POTTER. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] is recognized for 15 minutes.

LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR A PERMANENT CONGRESSIONAL COMMISSION ON GOVERNMENT EFFICIENCY AND ECONOMY

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill providing for a congressional Commission on Government Efficiency and Economy, responsible only to the Congress. The Commission would keep the Congress advised at all times with respect to the improper and unnecessary use of Federal funds, the overlapping and duplication of Federal functions and activities, and nonessential Federal expenditures.

It will be the function of this Commission, among other things, to advise Congress regarding the extent to which the recommendations of the Hoover Commission are carried out and the amount of savings of funds and manpower which would be achieved.

Under the terms of the bill, the Commission is required to make an annual report to the Congress in January of each year. This report shall contain, in addition to a statement regarding Government fiscal and budgetary policies, specific information, data, studies, and recommendations relating to the following: First, all nonessential Federal expenditures; second, the overlapping and duplication of Federal functions and activities; third, excessive numbers of Federal personnel; fourth, procurement and disposal of Federal property; fifth, Federal personnel and administrative management practices; sixth, exercise of authority or performance of functions by the Federal Government in excess of constitutional or statutory authority; and, seventh, specific problems related to the expenditure of Federal funds which may be referred to the Commission from time to time by any Member or committee of Congress.

Thus far during fiscal year 1951 which ends June 30, the Congress has appropriated in excess of $70,000,000,000 to carry on the functions and activities of our Government. Notwithstanding the excess profits tax approved by the Eighty-first Congress—effective July 1, 1950—appropriations for Government expenditures during this fiscal year will exceed Federal revenues by almost $25,000,000,000.

Since 1930 the expenditures of the Federal Government have exceeded revenues, except during the 2-year period of the Eightieth Congress. Of course, much of this expenditure was for the purpose of supplying manpower, supplies, and materials necessary for the successful prosecution of World War II. However, much of this money was wasted and could have been saved if there had been in existence an agency responsible to the Congress which would have reported to Congress concerning those expenditures that were nonessential or unnecessary.

Reports of congressional committees during the war, including the Truman committee, the Byrd committee, and the investigating subcommittee of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, have pointed out how Federal funds were extravagantly used or spent unnecessarily.

A distinguished member of the majority party recently pointed out that nonmilitary expenditures during fiscal year 1951 will be approximately $9,171,000,000, compared with $3,591,000,000 for similar purposes during 1946. Senator HARRY F. BYRD, who is universally recognized as an outstanding expert in governmental fiscal affairs, has reached the inescapable conclusion that the Government can reduce nonmilitary expenditures by several billions of dollars during the coming year. I am in accord with his views. Some time ago I called attention to the particular items that could be reduced without injury to our Government.

It is almost impossible to reduce Federal expenditures in any sizable amounts without an agency whose sole function it is to investigate and report to the Congress regarding the waste of Federal funds. Under my proposal the Commission on Government Efficiency and Economy would be cut clear from the administrative entanglements of the executive branch of the Government. It would not be under the thumb of the President, the Bureau of the Budget, or other administration advisers.

In my examinations of the Federal budgets presented to the Congress each year by the President, I have observed that, without exception, these recommendations contain hundreds of millions of dollars that are really unnecessary and represent "boondoggling" and "pork barrel" products. The approval of this legislation would deal directly with that problem.

The alarming fact about the national deficit is not only its gigantic proportion of $256,000,000,000 but the fact that year after year the Federal Government continues to run in the red without the slightest regard for the effect upon the national economy, high prices, and standard of living of the American people. The serious impact of excessive Federal expenditures is felt in every home of the Nation through higher prices and inflation. This continued annual insolvency of our Government must be eliminated wherever it is possible to do so.

The Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government made a careful study of the operations and activities of the executive branch and has made certain recommendations with respect to the reorganization of the Government. It is estimated approximately $4,000,000,000 could be saved by following these recommendations. In the areas where the greatest savings can be made by adoption of the Hoover commission recommendations, little action has been taken. Most of the recommendations which will result in greater efficiency and economy in the Government must be carried out by the departments and agencies themselves. For example, the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee recently pointed out where savings could be made by a more effective utilization of Federal employees and transferring employees engaged in nondefense activities to vital defense work. This requires administrative rather than legislative action.

The Congress is not equipped, nor has it ever been equipped, to point out with particularity, agency by agency, bureau by bureau, division by division, and unit by unit, wherein a more effective Government service can be provided at less cost to the taxpayers.

The approval of this legislation and the creation of the Commission is the proper and effective way to solve this problem. In the years when our Government remained small, or between 1941 and 1946 when winning the war transcended all other matters, it may have not been so necessary to examine closely the expenditure of each dollar of Federal funds. However, we have reached a point today where it is extremely necessary for the Congress to have a permanent agency, similar to the Hoover commission, which will keep the Members and committees of Congress advised regarding these important matters.

In each new Congress many committees and subcommittees are created to make studies of Government inefficiency and waste and report their findings and recommendations to the Congress. Most often these reports, based upon many months of lengthy hearings and staff work, are filed and forgotten. Only the newspaper headlines of a particular day reveal the story of the findings of these congressional committees. The approval of this legislation would eliminate the necessity for the appointment and for the expense of these additional committees and subcommittees.

In many instances the reports and recommendations of congressional committees are ignored by succeeding Congresses. There is no concerted effort on the part of the legislative or executive branches to determine whether the recommendations are carried out or what final action is taken with respect to them.

The Appropriations Committees of the Congress perform outstanding work. But they have neither the permanent personnel nor the time to devote to the detailed and careful follow-up necessary in connection with following the expenditure of all of the billions of dollars which are appropriated.

The time has come for the Congress to adopt measures and methods of operation in keeping with present day needs. The Congress cannot perform its work effectively or perform its functions under the Constitution in this twentieth century if it must rely upon antiquated and outmoded practices, methods, and procedures.

The facilities and assistance available to Members and committees of Congress were greatly improved by the enactment of the Legislative Reorganization Act, but much remains to be done. I propose the establishment of the Commission created under my bill as the next step which should be taken. The legislation I have submitted provides for the appropriation of $200,000 for the activities of the Commission during the remainder of this fiscal year, and for not more than $400,000 for each fiscal year thereafter. In my judgment, the expenditure of $400,000 annually for a Commission on Government Efficiency and Economy will pay for itself a thousand times over during the first year after its creation. The mere existence of the Commission would cause the executive departments and agencies to analyze more carefully their operations. They would devote more time to the improvement of their activities in order to demonstrate economies which can be made if they so desire.

The Citizens' Committee for the Hoover Report, under the able leadership of Chairman Robert I. Johnson, has rendered invaluable assistance to the Government in connection with following up the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. However, their activities are restricted and the Congress cannot require the Citizens' Committee to engage in additional studies even though such work is clearly necessary.

At the conclusion of the work of the Hoover Commission, President Hoover, Chairman of the Commission, stated:

> The burden now passes from the shoulders of the Commission to the citizens themselves who must undertake a real and continuing responsibility.

Since the Members of Congress represent the citizens of our country who overwhelmingly support the recommendations of the Hoover Commission for economy and efficiency in government operation, it is obvious the Congress must equip itself for the task of carrying out the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

The Hoover Commission in reporting to Congress stated:

> The Nation is paying heavily for a lack of order, a lack of clear lines of authority and responsibility, and a lack of organization in the executive branch.

Despite the steps which have been taken in the direction of improving our Government's operation, much remains to be done.

The recent slogan of the Citizens' Committee for the Hoover Report is "better government at a better price." My proposal for the creation of a permanent Commission on Government Efficiency and Economy, responsible only to the Congress, is the clear and obvious answer.

Mr. Speaker, the people of this country in various walks of life are deeply concerned with respect to the question of efficiency and economy in government. Almost every day attention is called to inactivity by the legislative and executive branches of the Government with respect to this problem.

At this particular time it is extremely important that we have the highest efficiency and the greatest economy in government expenditures, especially as it relates to expenditures not necessary to carry out the program of expanded defense of our country.

I believe it is fitting that at the outset of this, the Eighty-second Congress, this proposal should be presented which will approach the problem of Federal expenditures in a more constructive manner. The Commission which I offer will not usurp the powers or prerogatives of the Congress. It will be completely subservient to its wishes. It will provide an up-to-date, modern and effective method of preventing waste, eliminating useless expenditures and securing a successful and efficient government in this period of national crisis.

In my judgment, this legislation should be approved before the Congress takes action with respect to increased taxes or additional appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

WHITE HOUSE SURPLUS MATERIAL

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address the House on the subject of the surplus material of the White House. Every Member of Congress will be interested in this, and I will try to be as brief as possible.

Next week in the Speaker's lobby there will be a board showing the materials that will be available to the Members of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Commission on the Renovation of the Executive Mansion, it is my pleasure to come before the Members of this body to inform them of the details of the plan which has been adopted for the disposition of the surplus made available by the reconstruction work now in progress at the White House.

Members will appreciate, of course, the widespread historical interest which attaches to this material coming as it does from the residence of American Presidents from John Adams to Harry S. Truman.

In this connection, the Congress, through its passage of House Joint Resolution 714, in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, now Public Law 377, has decreed that the plan of disposition adopted by the Commission shall be consistent with the symbolical value of the materials and that the plan shall be accomplished without commercial exploitation of the materials.

Consequently, the Commission has gone to some pains to devise a plan for the most equitable distribution of this material which has a definite historical value for many Americans. I feel that the Members of Congress will agree that the Commission has accomplished this end and that the plan proposed meets the very proper requirements laid down in Public Law 377.

The adopted plan has the approval of President Truman and it is expected that deliveries of the surplus material will commence about February 1, 1951.

The display board shows the material that will be available and some of the suggested finished products that can be made therefrom. Members will note the cane and gavel which can be turned from rough pieces of wood; the book ends which can be cut from rough pieces of stone; the old square nails, rough pieces of small stone and wood which can be mounted on plaques or used for desk ornaments.

However, it should be noted, that it is not the intention of the Commission to manufacture these items and such prices as will be charged will cover only the costs of processing the unfinished material for shipment.

There is one exception to this, however, one small and one large desk ornament can be contracted for to be supplied at approximately the indicated price, depending on the demand and the prices prevailing at the time.

The Commission has inventoried the surplus material and a quota for each Member of Congress has been established. This quota is a percentage of the quota for the individual Member's congressional district which is based on the population of the district. I am advised that it is not too rigid and could be varied to a small degree in special, individual cases.

Members should note that their individual quotas cover the materials they wish for their own use and for which they are to make an advance payment. It has nothing to do with direct requests to the Commission from interested persons. Payments in such cases are to be made by the applicant.

I have here a sample of the special order blank which has been prepared for the use of the Members of Congress, which shows their quotas and the handling price to be charged for each item. This differs from the blank to be used by the public.

Shortly after this announcement there will be a public announcement and applications will be received from the public either directly by the Commission or through Members of Congress. I would like to emphasize that while deliveries are expected to commence about February 1, there is a deadline of June 30, after which time no applications for this material will be considered.

A study of this plan will, I believe, be convincing proof that the Commission has not taken lightly its responsibility to the Congress and to the country in providing for the disposition of this historically symbolical material.

The White House, the Capitol Building, and the Supreme Court are the physical structures which symbolize the constitutional framework of our Government. It is altogether right and proper that these magnificent buildings be revered by all loyal Americans who hold our system of government in high esteem. The Commission has accepted its responsibility for the renovation of the Executive Mansion with a proper respect for that feeling and it is my hope that this proposal will merit the approval of the Members of Congress as the most fitting and equitable device possible under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SUTTON] is recognized for 1 hour.

THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, I was very greatly concerned over the remarks of the President when he recently appeared before our joint session of the Congress and gave us his message upon the state of the Nation.

We all realize that these are perilous times and that we are dealing with people who have no conscience, no respect for the spiritual side of life, and no wish to compromise, except on their own terms. The blueprint and master plan have been prepared and apparently the underlying thought of the aggressor nations is conquest by infiltration or conquest by force. Many of the peace-loving nations of the world resent the attitude of certain aggressor nations and are united in an attempt to destroy communism.

The fighting forces of the United Nations at the present time comprise some 12 or 13 countries, but it has fallen our lot, I mean the lot of the United States, to carry the brunt of the burden. The United States has furnished more men in the Korean conflict than all of the rest of the United Nations who are engaged in this war added together, including South Korea.

The Eighty-first Congress, which adjourned on the 2d day of this month, authorized a total appropriation of some $74,903,274,567 in appropriations, contract authorizations, and loan authorizations, which are an obligation on all of the people of this Nation. The majority of this huge sum will be spent for the procurement of goods and services by various agencies of the Federal Government in the next 12 months. Should all of the authorized spending be completed in the year 1951, the average rate of Federal spending based upon the 260-day Federal work year—including holidays and allowances for annual and sick leave—will be at the average rate of $288,088,469 per work day. On the basis of the Federal 8-hour day, the spending will be at the rate of $36,011,058 an hour, or $600,184 a minute. Every time the clock ticks off 1 second the Government expenditures will amount to more than $10,000, provided there are no further appropriations for the fiscal year of 1951.

I give you these figures in order that we may realize the huge expenses that the taxpayers of this Nation have and will incur in connection with the conflict which is being forced upon us. Such condition demands unity and cooperation on the part of all Government agencies.

It has not been my lot to be a Member of this body very long. As you all know, I am now beginning my second term, but since my election to Congress I have been keenly interested in the operation of the agencies of this Government. I know that it is impossible that any agency as large as our Federal agencies can be letter-perfect. But, on the other hand, there is evidence and concrete assurance of unnecessary bungling, malfeasance, and misfeasance in office, and I fear, misappropriation of the taxpayers' money, to the extent that borders on criminal.

The taxpayers of this Nation are reconciled to the fact that the defense program is going to cost many billions of dollars. Our people are accustomed to freedom. They would not sacrifice their free way of life for all of the imperialist governments on earth, and are willing to pay whatever is necessary to retain this Republic.

One of the greatest necessities of our defense program, not considering, of course, munitions of war, is the problem of housing. Billions of dollars must necessarily be expended in all parts of the world to house our fighting men and to take care of the respective military headquarters. Furthermore, already we have authorized huge expenditures for a second atomic-bomb plant to be erected near Paducah, Ky. Likewise, billions of dollars will be expended at the hydrogen-bomb plant being erected in South Carolina. A large portion of these expenditures will go for housing. As the houses are erected, the expansion of the respective projects proceed. Until quarters are maintained for the personnel, delay can naturally be expected in the completion of our defense projects.

The Congress, many years ago, foresaw the possibility of dire need for projects such as will be necessary in the defense program, and for that reason, set up what we now refer to as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This Corporation was empowered to loan money to businessmen for the purpose of developing new ideas and, among other things, was authorized to come to the rescue of businessmen throughout the country when they had certain types of patents or projects in mind that would be helpful to the Government in times of peril, or ideas that would coincide with the aggressiveness or protection of our Nation. It has come to my attention that the RFC has made numerous authorizations, many of which run into large figures.

At the present time, I note that the total assets of the RFC, according to their annual report and financial statement of June 30, 1950, were $2,161,084,203. From this huge amount we can imagine the number of loans and amount of business that is being transacted by this Government agency.

The RFC should be a godsend to the American people in times like these. However, I regret exceedingly to say that apparently very poor business judgment has been used in many cases as there is concrete evidence that some of those who were connected with this great agency possess that well-known lust for gold. Apparently it has been their desire to acquire the almighty dollar, in some cases, rather than to take care of the interests of the taxpayers of this Nation.

It is amusing to reflect back on some of the dealings that have been negotiated in the RFC. I understand that there is a concern in Texas who procured a loan from the RFC in the amount of $300,000, to be used in purchasing and drying eggs. When interrogated, it was determined that the egg-buying concern in Texas relied principally upon the Federal Government for the sale of their product. The RFC maintained that the loan was an excellent one because $269,000 of the original $300,000 loan had been repaid. But they denied any knowledge of the fact that the Government was guaranteeing the prices of eggs. In other words, they loaned money to buy eggs to be sold back to the Government at a profit.

There is another plant in Texas, known as the Novelty Plant and Pottery Co. They grow cactus in rock gardens. They baked their own pottery to put the cactus in. They also engaged in the sale of mistletoe, which, as we all know, is used for getting-kissed purposes during the holidays. Kissing business being good, the Novelty Pottery Co. needed to expand; therefore, they applied to the RFC for money for expansion purposes and to pay some of their back debts. One of their appraisers, I mean the pottery company appraisers, indicated to the RFC that the property was worth $90,037, which included $36,214 of rock garden for growing cactus, $9,450 for a warehouse to store the cactus in the pots, and $8,715 for kilns in which the pots were baked.

The RFC office at Dallas, Tex., approved the loan in the amount of $48,000. The taxpayers put up some $36,000 and a bank down in Ranger, Tex., furnished the remaining $12,000. For 2 years their business boomed, and the notes were paid at a regular $400 monthly installment. Later, the bottom fell out of the cactus plant business and apparently kissing lost some of its savor and thrill, as the mistletoe business likewise went on the rocks.

When queried, the company stated that they did not know what was wrong but that they did know that they could not meet the remaining $400 monthly payments, which were 7 months in default.

Not long ago, the RFC demanded payment of $40,800 balance on the cactus-mistletoe loan. The proprietors admitted that they were sorry, but were certain that the Government could not get blood out of unsold cactus. Shortly thereafter, the RFC obtained a judgment in the Abilene, Tex., Federal district court in the amount of $42,545.06. After the judgment was obtained, the RFC sent their own appraiser to take a look at their $98,000 cactus factory. This is what he found and what the appraiser set out in his report. The $36,214 rock garden, which he referred to as concrete, was appraised at $100. The $9,450 warehouse referred to in the appraiser's report as a shed, was valued at $150. The $8,715 worth of kilns were valued by the RFC appraiser at $600. The whole shebang, including a couple of thousand pots of cactus, and a 1946 Ford truck, were reported by the RFC appraiser as not being worth the original $98,000, but according to his judgment, only $4,514. The RFC ordered the United States marshal to sell the works at public auction on February 7, 1950. Apparently no one wanted the bankrupt cactus and horticultural kissing laden store, so the RFC bought it in for $2,000. Then it sold the truck for $450. The taxpayers now own the rest of the enterprise.

The Waltham Watch Co. got into financial difficulty. The RFC slipped about $4,000,000 into the company in a vain attempt to keep it ticking, but the firm went bankrupt anyway.

The RFC grabbed the assets, which were $500,000 in cash, $50,000 in completed watches, and $200,000 in watch movements, which needed cases before they could be strapped on the wrists. The United States District Court in Boston—Judge George Sweeney—was trying to reorganize the firm and get it out of bankruptcy. The legal snarl became so complicated that nobody understood what was going on, except the judge. Not long ago, the judge ordered the Government loan agency to turn back to the trustees of the Waltham Corp. all of its assets. The RFC gave up the watches and the movements, but it held on to the $500,000. But the judge ordered them to fork the money over too. The RFC refused, on the ground that it was Government money. The court fined the RFC for contempt of court in the amount of $50,000, and announced that he would impose a second fine later to pay the defunct watch company for the damages suffered.

John J. Hagerty who was in charge of the Waltham Watch Co. at a salary of $30,000 a year, presumably a requirement before the loan would be made, operated the company for approximately 6 months, after which time the watch company went into bankruptcy. Then, Hagerty was rehired by the RFC as a special assistant to the Board of Directors. So far as I know, this is the only case on record where a fine has been imposed upon the Government and then the Government loan the money to pay the Government's bailiff.

Another case of misfeasance upon the part of the officials of the RFC involves a loan from the RFC to what was known as the American Stenographer in the amount of $300,000. This was a concern located down in Broward County, Fla. The American Stenographer was supposed to manufacture a device which would retail for $42.50, and would do away forever with smudges or ink on stenographers' fingers.

The RFC examiners at the Jacksonville, Fla., loan agency, disapproved the application, stating that the firm did not have enough assets and found that the ribbons were not sufficiently perfected. RFC agreed. So did the advisory committee. However, one of the owners of the ribbon company appealed to Washington, and sent some of the ribbon attachments to the Nation's Capital for the Federal financiers to try out on their stenographers. Apparently, the head men in Washington thought that the gadgets were fine. They reversed their Florida representatives and granted the loan. Two months later, the Ribbon Rider Corp. of America was bankrupt.

Another case of much concern happened during World War II. The Aieron Manufacturing Co., of Kansas City, made parts for flying machines. When the shooting was over, it went into the juke-box business, and applied to the RFC for a loan. A loan in the amount of $1,500,000 was approved. Eight months later, the firm went into bankruptcy. The RFC foreclosed and for more than five long years the taxpayers have owned a first-class, but dusty, juke-box factory.

A short time ago, the RFC negotiated a sale of the plant for $700,000, but it later developed that their purchasers were income-tax evaders standing trial for income-tax evasions, thus necessitating the rescission of the sale agreement. Uncle Sam still owns the juke-box factory. The inventory discloses that the manufacturing company's liability as of June 17, 1950, was $1,773,069.28. The liquidating value is approximately $450,000.

Then, we all, of course, remember Sam Evans, of California, the old rattlesnake maestro. Sam repeatedly applied for $20,000 loan from the RFC to build a modern home for his pet rattlesnakes. The RFC eventually approved the loan for the snake quarters, but they got into a squabble, and argued so long about the specifications of the house, that by the time the snake mansion was ready for occupation, the snakes were all dead. Sam, of course, automatically went out of business, and the taxpayers are the proprietors of a snake farm, without any snakes.

The RFC officials maintained that the loan was made in the public interest. When asked why they had determined a snake farm to be of public interest, and why they did not intend to operate the same, one of the RFC directors volunteered that it was a small business, and the law says that we should help small businesses. Sam Evans charged that he was forced into bankruptcy because the Government inspectors kept changing their minds on exactly how his modern snake apartment should be built.

Of course, these are isolated cases, and I do not want to infer that the RFC has not been of material benefit in numerous other instances.

At the present time, I am very much concerned over the loan of the RFC to Lustron Corp. From the information reaching me, this loan was meritorious. One Mr. Carl Strandlund, an industrialist and engineer of proven ability, and who knows mass-production methods as well as any man in America, conceived the idea of developing a plant for the construction of metal prefabricated houses.

During World War II, Engineer Strandlund was connected with the Chicago Vitreous Enamel Product Co. As we all know, they were the producers of armor plate, used for tank turrents and commander domes. He was the principal developer of a press-quench method for hardening armor plate which cut production time to 30 man-hours per ton, when many other plants were taking 500 man-hours per ton. His method cut processing time for one operation from 14 hours to 8 seconds, and was called one of the most outstanding war-production contributions in the vast Chicago ordnance district. He was executive vice president of the plant, which was tooled in a period of a few months to make commander domes at the rate of 24 a day when the largest other plant making this equipment was turning out only 1½ domes a day. The invalued service that he rendered during World War II is unquestioned and was recognized by the Government in the awarding of the Army-Navy E. He also received the Chicago Tribune special award.

When the war was over, Mr. Strandlund appealed to the RFC for a loan to erect a plant for building prefabricated homes. Different loans were approved totaling some $37,500,000, and over a period of a few months, the Lustron Corp., headed by the afore-mentioned Strandlund, completed one of the most modern metal plants in the world.

It covers some 23 acres, or over a million square feet of floor space, and is tooled with over $15,000,000 worth of special machinery and equipment, all of which is now intact near Columbus, Ohio. The plant was fully completed in late June of 1949, and demonstrated that it was capable of producing 100 houses a day. Before the RFC foreclosed, it had produced and shipped nearly 2,500 houses to all parts of the country, including houses to Alaska and Venezuela. At a time when ordinary machinery required 14 to 18 months for delivery, Mr. Strandlund had his plant completely tooled, tested, and ready to go with specially designed equipment in a matter of less than 18 months, and had produced over 2,000 houses.

The $37,500,000 loaned by the RFC to the Lustron Corp. was evidenced by several notes, the first note being in the amount of $15,500,000 which was a 7-year note. The remaining $22,000,000 was loaned on notes for less than a year's duration, and several million dollars of it for as little as 60 days. In other words, RFC foreclosed on suicide notes which Lustron could not possibly have paid back in the time demanded by RFC.

I am advised that the interest on all of these notes was current, and that the Lustron Corp. was operating smoothly, and had just procured orders for some 8,000 houses. However, the officials of the RFC had become very greatly interested in the operation of the Lustron plant and had made certain demands on Mr. Strandlund that he employ persons to be selected by them as officials in the corporation. It was finally determined that one of their requirements was that he relinquish a majority of his stock, and that the RFC would name a new board of directors.

At the suggestion of certain members of the Board of the RFC, one Merl Young, a former RFC employee, was placed upon the payroll of the Lustron Corp. at a salary of $12,000 a year, which was later raised to $18,000 at the suggestion of the chairman of the board, Mr. Harley Hise. The salary of Mr. Young was specifically approved in writing by the RFC. It was later revealed that at the same time that Mr. Young was on the payroll of the Lustron Corp. at a salary of $18,000, he was also drawing $10,000 a year from a Mr. Rex Jacobs of Detroit, a washing-machine manufacturer.

Extended hearings have been held by a special committee of the Senate on the Lustron Corp. project, and I understand that it was testified that on May 4, 1949, one of the RFC directors, Mr. Walter Dunham, visited the Lustron plant in company with other RFC employees. On June 29 Mr. Dunham advised the president of the Lustron Corp. that Mr. Rex Jacobs, one of the employers of Merl Young, would visit the Lustron plant. It is common knowledge that Merl Young had visited in the home of Rex Jacobs, on the week end of the 4th of July in Detroit. On July 6 Rex Jacobs called at the Lustron plant in Columbus, Ohio. While he was in the office of the president, Mr. Walter Dunham of the RFC called from Washington and asked if Mr. Jacobs was there. He stated that Jacobs was his good friend, and he urged the president of the Lustron Corp. to "talk freely" to Mr. Jacobs, repeating the phrase "talk freely" several times. Jacobs inspected the plant and proposed that his company furnish the washing machines to be used in all Lustron houses, and stated at the time that Merl Young, who it was later determined was on Jacob's payroll, and likewise drawing $18,000 a year from the Lustron Corp., would receive $15 for each washing machine installed in a Lustron house. Not bad, since it is an established fact that the Lustron Corp. can produce 100 houses a day. It is a matter of figures that Mr. Young would have been receiving a juicy yearly income of possibly $375,000 in addition to his salary from the manufacturers of the washing machines and the $18,000 paid by the Lustron Corp.

Because of an existing contract which Lustron had with another company Mr. Strandlund was not in a position to comply with Mr. Jacob's demand, even if he had wanted to do so, and he turned Mr. Jacobs down.

About the same time, on June 22, 1949, to be exact, Mr. Strandlund filed an application for an additional loan with RFC. The amount of this loan previously had been worked out in extended conferences with RFC officials and was, in fact, considerably larger than Mr. Strandlund felt he would need to put the company in the black.

Very shortly after the Jacobs proposal that the Lustron Corp. utilize his washing machines was rejected, unfavorable publicity concerning the operation of the Lustron Corp. began to appear in the newspapers quoting Reconstruction Finance Corporation officials, and the loan that Lustron needed to put it in the black was never granted.

After refusing to approve the loan which had already been worked out, the officials of the RFC began putting pressure on the president of Lustron Corp. to force him to give up 60,000 shares of his personal stock and control of the company to a new group headed by Rex Jacobs and some of his friends, included among whom were Merl Young and Walter Dunham, one of the directors of the RFC. According to the record, Strandlund refused to be a party to what was termed a conspiracy, so from what transpired thereafter, it is natural to assume that if the new group could not control Lustron Corp. that they would not permit the company to operate. Accordingly, foreclosure proceedings were instituted in February 1950, and Lustron Corp. has been closed and tied up in court ever since. I am advised that the officials of the corporation have been hopeful that the plant could be reactivated and for that reason have not permitted the fires to die out of the furnaces. In times like we are now experiencing according to my way of thinking it is close to treason to permit a modern plant with more than $15,000,000 in the best of machinery to lie idle because of the maladministration of a few money-hungry officials of a Government agency.

There is no question as to the type of product Lustron was producing. Some 60 houses were erected at the marine base at Quantico, Va., and at this point I want to call your attention to what General Shepherd, who is now in charge of the Marine Corps in Korea, had to say about the Lustron houses. This is a letter from General Shepherd to Admiral Merrill, which I want to read in full:

HEADQUARTERS, MARINE CORPS SCHOOLS,
Quantico, Va., April 28, 1949.

Vice Adm. A. STANTON MERRILL,
United States Navy (Retired),
Natchez, Miss.

MY DEAR ADMIRAL MERRILL: It was a very pleasant surprise to learn that you have taken a serious interest in the handling of Lustron houses on the market. As you perhaps know, we have a very special interest in these houses because here at Quantico we are just completing 60 of them. They form the first major Lustron project to be erected in the United States.

We had on two previous occasions solicited bids in the open market for conventional houses. However, our remote location here in the country and the large amount of on-the-site work forced the prices up to levels above those which we were allowed to pay. Since it was apparent that work at the site must be reduced to a minimum, we placed our housing project on the market a third time and solicited bids for prefabricated houses.

We received bids from eight manufacturers of plant-fabricated houses. The units offered to us varied widely in quality and price, but the lowest of all in cost per square foot was the Lustron steel house.

Now that we have had some of these houses occupied for several months and have had a chance to study them thoroughly, we are more than satisfied with them. I like them because their attractive architecture, their trim appearance, and their varied colors do so much for the appearance of the station. My engineers like them, because they are efficiently designed along sound engineering lines and offer the promise of great durability. The quartermaster likes them, because they are so well insulated that it takes a relatively small amount of fuel to heat them comfortably. The maintenance officer likes them, because they are not subject to rot nor to termites. Moreover, they offer no fire hazard whatever, since there is nothing in them except the furniture which can burn.

The housewives like them, because they are so easy to keep clean and because their convenient lay-out reduces the housework to a minimum. Some of them have reported that their lively youngsters require less attention, because there is so little about the house that can be damaged. All of them are enthusiastic about the large amount of convenient storage space. From the viewpoint of the husbands, of course, the most attractive feature is the automatic dishwasher.

Those of us who have studied this problem at some length feel sincerely that the Lustron Corp. has opened the door to a tremendous future. I myself believe that the techniques used in building these houses will be perfected as time goes along, so that with reduction in housing costs there will be a corresponding rise in housing standards throughout the country.

I believe you have taken a wise course in looking into the Lustron house and wish you every success with it in the future.

Yours very sincerely,

LEMUEL C. SHEPHERD, Jr.,
Major General, United States Marine Corps, Commandant, Marine Corps Schools.

Commander Davis, who is now the public works officer in the Quantico Marine Reservation, is a great booster of Lustron houses. Recently I had occasion to talk with him personally and he advised me that the best evidence of the very high type house that Lustron produces, could be procured by a personal inspection of the 60 houses that are now in use at the Quantico Marine Barracks. He informs me that they require no upkeep, are less expensive to the Government, and more satisfactory to the people than any other type of house that the Marines have ever had.

I further understand that these 60 houses were erected at a saving to the taxpayers of the Nation of some $6,000 per unit. The Government could save the full $37,500,000 it has loaned Lustron if it bought only 6,000 houses. The Lustron Corp. is not only the producer of residences but has produced buildings that are suitable for barracks, mess halls, hospitals, and other facilities that the military agencies desperately need. It is a proven fact that the type of house that Lustron was building can be produced at a material saving over any other type of conventional house.

Furthermore, the evidence in the RECORD proves that the Lustron house may be removed from pillar to post at a small cost and without material damage. At this particular time when the Federal Government must spend billions of dollars for housing over the country, it is easily understood how millions can be saved for the taxpayers if the Lustron Corp. plant is immediately put into operation.

When the foreclosure proceedings were instituted by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the plant offered for sale, the Government was the highest bidder and purchaser at $6,000,000.

I am advised that it is admitted by those in authority at the RFC that if the Lustron plant is to be salvaged, that they cannot hope to realize more than some $5,000,000 for their $37,500,000 investment.

Recently, in conference with some of the officials of the Lustron Corp., they advised me that they had heretofore contacted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in an effort to reschedule their loans in the full amount and, if permitted to repay the same over a reasonable period of years, could assure the construction of some 100 houses a day after the plant had regained its full operating capacity. They assured me that they could repay the entire amount of the RFC loans if they were given a fair opportunity to do so.

In view of the President's remarks recently when he spoke to us on the State of the Nation regarding the practice of economy, it appears to me that it is sound business to operate a plant in which the Government has invested some $37,500,000 if we can show a saving on billions of dollars' worth of houses to the tune of some $4,000 or $6,000 a unit. Certainly now is no time to destroy a plant that is considered one of the finest of its kind in the country for the comparative measly sum of some four or five million just because apparently some of the members of the RFC were disgruntled over the fact that one of their former employees could not receive $15 for each washing machine installed and $90,000 cash for his influence with the RFC, together with their desire to procure complete domination and control over the operation of the Lustron Corp.

As will be borne out when the report comes from the Senate committee investigating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, several thousand dollars have been accepted by the officials of the RFC in bribes to secure loans on different projects, and because Lustron would not follow the precedent that some of the members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had set in granting loans they would not go along in trying to help the housing project which is so drastically needed in this time of emergency. I refer to this casually in that I would be betraying the confidence of those who have given me the information that has been given to the Senate committee investigating the RFC, but not yet officially and publically reported, but which report, so I understand, will be available on January 31, when the Senate subcommittee, under Senator FULBRIGHT, reports to the Congress. I hope that each Member of the House of Representatives will get this report and note the inefficiency and incompetency of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board. When this report is released to the Congress I believe that the Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives will demand that the members of the Board be denied confirmation and that the President request a one-man Administrator for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, whose integrity, honesty, and character is beyond reproach.

On numerous occasions I have talked with officials of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and with people who have had business with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and it is my unbiased impression that if the Government of the United States is run by officials like certain members of the RFC, then this Government cannot long endure.

As for myself, I am grateful to the Senate subcommittee for investigating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and I hope that when the report is made available that the people of the country and the Congress of the United States will remedy the situation and put a stop to hoodwinking the taxpayers of the United States such as has been the attitude of the members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board.

In the first place, I do not believe in bribes, and in the second place, I believe it is beyond the character of any Government officials to insinuate that he will accept bribes, but when testimony brings out the fact that they have accepted money, as well as other bribes, then there is no place in the Government for such men.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, during the Eighty-first Congress the President's Reorganization Plan No. 23 was ordered into force and effect. That plan proposes to transfer from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Administrator, all functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with respect to financing of the prefabricated housing industry, including the financing of large scale modernized site construction.

The transfer would include functions including assumptions by the Administrator of related operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation held by the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the obligation of paying interest thereon and the assurance of new obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury to finance future operations. I understand that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation complied with this reorganization order to the letter, with the exception of Lustron Corp. They have refused to transfer Lustron since Reorganization Plan No. 23 became effective on September 9, 1950.

So far as I am concerned, they are guilty of violating specific instructions from the President of the United States and of the Congress. The hearings in the committee investigating the Lustron loan were closed and all of the testimony has not been made available to me. However, I have been the recipient of enough information to be of the opinion that all is not well and that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation officials are guilty of much maladministration. Mr. Speaker, the Members of Congress of the United States are as much the guardian of the rights of the citizens and taxpayers of the Government, as are the law enforcement officers and the courts of this land. There has been too much fumbling and too much covering up in the Lustron deal and, as for me, I am of the opinion that now is the time to air the whole thing in detail and let the chips fall where they may.

Personally, I have no interest of any kind in any corporation or the officials thereof, but in times of peril we are certainly entitled to the fruits from plants that have been erected or constructed at the taxpayers' expense. The Lustron plant should be reopened for business immediately; thus bringing about millions of dollars of savings to the overburdened taxpayers of this Nation in taking care of our demands in the defense program.

Our defense program will require the erection of thousands of barracks and military houses in foreign countries, such as Alaska, Guam, Okinawa, and the Lord only knows where else. It is an established fact that prefabricated houses can be utilized at great savings of both time and expense. I insist that the Members of this body go into this matter in detail and demand that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board give us action immediately.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

CONSTANTINO BRUMIDI

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LYLE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to imagine any citizen of the United States to whom the Capitol building here in Washington, with its exceptional art and architecture and its wealth of history, is not an object of surpassing interest.

Speaker Clark frequently said that one of the most patriotic services Congress could render the country would be to provide that every American citizen once in his lifetime could visit Washington and see the National Capitol.

The same objective may be largely attained through the illumined pages of the charming volume, Constantino Brumidi, just off the press. In this book Mrs. Myrtle Cheney Murdock brings to the reader not only an important chapter in the history of the Capitol of America but in their original colors, the incomparable paintings and decorations of the master artist who left his impress on every wall of the vast building from the entrance to the vaulted ceiling of the great dome itself.

Through these pages you may stand with Columbus as he planted the standard of Ferdinand and Isabella in the New World; with Washington at Valley Forge and with the industrial pioneers of the Nation as the reaper and the telegraph opened up new visions of progress and advanced civilization.

It is not only a volume of absorbing interest but it is a book without which no library is complete. Mrs. Murdock, the wife of our distinguished colleague from Arizona, is to be commended on this notable contribution to American art and literature.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, who revealest Thyself in all that is pure and true and lovely, we beseech Thee to help us make our hearts and minds the fitting audience chambers for Thy presence. Help us in all things to be masters of ourselves that we may be the servants of all. In meeting grave issues growing out of what is wrong with the world, reveal to us what is wrong with ourselves. Make us vividly conscious that we cannot meet and conquer hatred and rampant selfish aggression abroad with material weapons only; but that our own hearts must be the homes of love and purity and honesty if we are to be Thy instruments for the transforming of the world. In these times of tension and strain, keep us calm in temper, clear in mind, sound of heart, in spite of ingratitude, meanness, or even treachery. In these crucial and creative days, enable Thy servants here, in posts of high public office, to perform faithfully and well what Thou dost require, even to do justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with Thee, our God. In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

AWARD OF CONGRESSIONAL MEDALS OF HONOR TO AMERICAN SOLDIERS IN THE KOREAN CAMPAIGN

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on Wednesday, January 9, 1951, there occurred at the White House a deeply moving ceremony. The President of the United States conferred the Congressional Medal of Honor on five heroic men of the United States Army who died, or who are missing in action, in Korea.

The names of the men to whose relatives the Medal of Honor was awarded are Pfc Melvin L. Brown, Mahaffey, Pa.; Sgt. (1c) Charles W. Turner, Boston, Mass.; Master Sgt. Travis E. Watkins, Gladewater, Tex.; First Lt. Frederick F. Henry, Clinton, Okla.; Maj. Gen. William F. Dean, Berkeley, Calif.

Theirs is the courage which enables a nation to survive the worst dangers. We in the Senate should acknowledge our debt of gratitude to these brave men by spreading the story of their heroism onto the pages of our RECORD.

I ask unanimous consent that this statement, together with the complete official texts of the five citations, be printed in the body of the RECORD, as close as possible to the front page of the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the citations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA SOLDIER AWARDED MEDAL OF HONOR FOR SINGLE-HANDED DEFENSE OF POSITION

Twenty-year-old Pfc Melvin L. Brown, of Mahaffey, Pa., has been given the Nation's highest award, the Medal of Honor, for single-handedly defending a position, atop a 50-foot wall, against repeated attacks while his platoon was securing Hill 755 (the Walled City), near Kasan, Korea, on September 4, 1950, the Department of the Army announced today.

The medal will be presented to Private Brown's father by President Truman in a White House ceremony at 11:30 a. m., January 9.

Private Brown is currently listed as missing in action in Korea.

The youthful soldier, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward D. Brown, also of Mahaffey, expended all of his rifle ammunition, then his hand grenades; and finally, though wounded, he resorted to his entrenching tool, a small shovel, to beat back attacks on his precarious perch. His action delayed the enemy troops, and enabled his platoon to repel them.

In addition to Private Brown's mother, those attending the ceremony will include his three sisters, Mrs. Evelyn Dickey, Clearfield, Pa.; Mrs. Dorothy Pease, Mahaffey; and Mrs. Beatrice Seger, of Glen Campbell, Pa.; and a brother, Pvt. Calvin W. Brown, First School Company, Atlanta General Depot, Atlanta, Ga., now at the home of his parents.

Several of Private Brown's comrades, who witnessed his lone battle on the wall, signed a joint statement describing the action as follows:

"During an attack on his platoon's perimeter of defense, whose mission was to secure Hill 755 (the Walled City), Private (first class) Brown took his position on a retaining wall approximately 50 feet high.

"Enemy superior in number started climbing the wall just as Private (first class) Brown's last round of ammunition was expended, and he was wounded by enemy fire.

"Realizing the vital necessity for holding, and without concern for his personal safety, though wounded and without his rifle, Private (first class) Brown continued to throw his few remaining hand grenades into the enemy, causing several casualties with each grenade.

"When his supply of grenades was exhausted, his comrades from nearby fox holes commenced throwing hand grenades toward his position. On several occasions, the grenades were thrown short of his position. When this would occur, Private (first class) Brown would leave his position and retrieve the grenades, exposing himself to enemy rifle and machine-gun fire.

"However, the enemy continued their climb, and Private (first class) Brown, taking his entrenching tool from his pack, waited until the enemy, one by one, peered over the wall, delivering each a skull-crushing blow across the top of his head.

"Private (first class) Brown's conspicuous performance in knocking from 10 to 12 enemy troops from the wall and his outstanding personal bravery served as an inspiration to his comrades, delayed the attack, and enabled his platoon to repel the enemy.

"Private (first class) Brown was seriously injured during this action, and has not been heard from since this attack.

"His courage and devotion to duty reflects the highest credit upon himself and the military service."

Private (first class) Brown entered the Army at Erie, Pa., on October 27, 1948.

The Medal of Honor citation follows:

"Private Brown, Company D, Eighth Engineer Combat Battalion, distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action against an enemy on September 4, 1950, near Kasan, Korea. While his platoon was securing hill 755 (the Walled City), the enemy, using heavy automatic weapons and small arms, counterattacked. Taking a position on a 50-foot-high wall he delivered heavy rifle fire on the enemy. His ammunition was soon expended, and although wounded, he remained at his post and threw his few grenades into the attackers causing many casualties. When his supply of grenades was exhausted his comrades from nearby fox holes tossed others to him and he left his position, braving a hail of fire, to retrieve and throw them at the enemy. The attackers continued to assault his position and Private Brown weaponless, drew his intrenching tool from his pack and calmly waited until they, one by one, peered over the wall, delivering each a crushing blow upon the head. Knocking 10 or 12 enemy from the wall his daring action so inspired his platoon that they repelled the attack and held their position. Private Brown's extraordinary heroism, gallantry, and intrepidity reflects the highest credit upon himself and was in keeping with the honored traditions of the military service."

ARMY AWARDS MEDAL OF HONOR TO SECOND INFANTRY DIVISION SERGEANT

Sgt. (1c) Charles W. Turner, 157 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Mass., who died from wounds received near Yongsan, Korea, on September 1, 1950, while directing his reconnaissance platoon's fire against a larger enemy force from an exposed position in a tank turret, has been awarded the Medal of Honor posthumously, the Department of the Army announced today.

Sergeant Turner's heroism was responsible for a successful defense by the Second Infantry Division platoon of its position from which it withdrew only when the ammunition supply ran low. He remained in an exposed vantage point for approximately 20 minutes under heavy enemy fire before he was fatally wounded.

The medal will be presented to his mother, Mrs. Hazel O. Turner, of the Boston address, by President Truman in a White House ceremony at 11:30 a. m., January 9, 1951. Also attending the presentation will be a brother, Harry H. Turner, and sister, Mrs. Jaqueline Xavier, both also of 157 Huntington Avenue, Boston.

The action which won the Nation's highest award for Sergeant Turner, an Army veteran of World War II who was taken prisoner by the Germans, was described by his platoon leader, First Lt. Ralph Decker, Jr., 1518 Jewell, Topeka, Kans.:

"On the morning of September 1, 1950, at about 5:30 o'clock, my platoon was attacked by a superior enemy force estimated at 150 to 200 men.

"Sergeant Turner, who was the scout squad leader, after checking his men in their positions and seeing that the main force of the attack was not toward his position, but further around to the left, exposed himself to the enemy fire for approximately 100 yards while making his way from his position to the platoon sergeant's tank to determine the situation and get instructions.

"Upon arriving at the platoon sergeant's tank, which was the keypoint of the platoon defense, and which was receiving the main enemy effort, Sergeant Turner immediately mounted to the exposed deck of the tank and manned the .50 caliber machine gun.

"Though under fire from several enemy automatic weapons and a number of riflemen, Sergeant Turner remained in this exposed position under increasingly heavy fire, firing the machine gun and directing the tank gun even though four men were wounded and one killed in his immediate vicinity, and the turret of the tank itself was struck by more than 50 bullets, 3 of which actually struck the mount of the gun he was manning.

"Sergeant Turner retained his exposed position for approximately 20 minutes before he was shot off; firing his gun, directing the tank fire, and shouting high-spirited encouragement to the other men in the position.

"On two occasions he called my attention to a threatened enemy penetration of the position, enabling me to move personnel to repulse them.

"Sergeant Turner's example of great courage and heroism and his jocular encouragement to the men around him undoubtedly was responsible for the splendid defense put up by the platoon, during which more than 50 enemy were killed, and the successful withdrawal when the ammunition supply ran out."

Sergeant Turner, who was 29 years old at the time of his death, enlisted in the National Guard on June 6, 1939, and entered active Federal service with the One Hundred and Ninety-first Tank Battalion on February 3, 1941. He served with the battalion in the Naples-Foggia and Central Europe campaigns until being taken prisoner by the Germans on November 19, 1943. He remained a prisoner of war until May 8, 1945, when he was returned to United States control.

Following is the Medal of Honor citation:

"Sergeant Turner, Second Reconnaissance Company, Second Infantry Division, distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action against the enemy near Yongsan, Korea. On September 1, 1950, a large enemy force launched a mortar and automatic weapon supported assault against his platoon. Sergeant Turner, a section leader, quickly organized his unit for defense and then observed that the attack was directed at the tank section 100 yards away. Leaving his secured section he dashed through a hail of fire to the threatened position and mounting a tank, manned the exposed turret machine gun. Disregarding the intense enemy fire he calmly held this position delivering deadly accurate fire and pointing out targets for the tank's 75-millimeter gun. His action resulted in the destruction of seven enemy machine-gun nests. Although severely wounded, he remained at the gun shouting encouragement to his comrades. During the action the tank received over 50 direct hits; the periscopes and antenna were shot away and three rounds hit the machine-gun mount. Despite this fire, he remained at his post until a burst of enemy fire cost him his life. This intrepid and heroic performance enabled the platoon to withdraw and later launch an attack which routed the enemy. Sergeant Turner's valor and example reflect the highest credit upon himself and are in keeping with the esteemed traditions of the Army of the United States."

ARMY MASTER SERGEANT AWARDED MEDAL OF HONOR POSTHUMOUSLY

Master Sgt. Travis E. Watkins, Gladewater, Tex., who displayed "cheerfulness, fortitude, and unflinching acceptance of fate's decree * * * during 4 days and nights of hell," has been posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor for conspicuous gallantry that led to his death near Yongsan, Korea, on September 3, 1950, the Department of the Army announced today.

The award of the Nation's highest honor to the Second Infantry Division soldier came as a result of action in which Sergeant Watkins took command of a beleaguered group of 30 men and directed a defense which repelled continuous, fanatical enemy assaults. At one time, he left the security of his defense position to kill five enemy soldiers in order to replenish his own ammunition and weapon supply. Later he killed six more to erase an enemy machine-gun nest.

The medal will be presented to the widow, Mrs. Maidie S. Watkins, 215 Gay Avenue, Gladewater, Tex., by President Truman in a White House ceremony at 11:30 a. m., January 9. Also attending the ceremony will be his mother, Mrs. Auzie M. Carter, and his stepfather, Marshall R. Carter, both of Odessa, Tex.; a brother, Sgt. Tris T. Watkins, assigned to Hunter Air Force Base at Savannah, Ga.; and his mother-in-law, Mrs. Alma Barnett, of Gladewater, Tex.

Another brother, Master Sgt. Truman R. Watkins, who has been serving in the Far East command, is scheduled to arrive at McChord Air Force Base, Wash., today so that he may attend the ceremony on Tuesday.

An account of Sergeant Watkins' heroic action was related in a joint statement by Master Sgt. Grover L. Bozarth, of 501 Franklin Street, Austin, Tex., and Sgt. (1c) Ralph G. Lillard, of 226 Vancouver Avenue, Tacoma, Wash., who participated in the dramatic events which began at daybreak last August 31.

"It became apparent," they said, "that the fighting was far to the rear, and the men's spirit was adversely affected. Sergeant Watkins, sensing this feeling became very active on the perimeter. He constantly exposed himself to heavy enemy fire as he moved from foxhole to foxhole encouraging and cheering the men.

"By the morning of September 2, the need for hand grenades became very critical. At about 9 a. m., Sergeant Watkins killed two North Koreans about 50 yards outside the northeast edge of the perimeter. Alone, he left the perimeter to retrieve the North Koreans' grenades and weapons.

"When he was about 20 yards from the bodies, three more North Koreans jumped to their feet and opened fire on him. Sergeant Watkins killed the three of them and calmly gathered weapons, ammunition, and insignia of all five. This action, witnessed by the men on the perimeter, was a great boost to their morale.

"At about 10 o'clock the same morning, a group of six North Koreans gained a protected spot about 25 feet from a machine-gun position and were throwing hand grenades into the position making it untenable.

"Sergeant Watkins, although previously wounded in the head, rose from his fox hole to engage the enemy with rifle fire. He was immediately subjected to steady and heavy enemy machine-gun fire, and was hit in the left side, breaking or severing his backbone.

"He never faltered, and completely disregarding his wounds, continued his fire until all six North Koreans were killed and the threat to the perimeter was eliminated. He then collapsed into his fox hole.

"Although paralyzed from the waist down, Sergeant Watkins never lost courage. As he lay in his fox hole for the next 2 days, he could be heard by his comrades shouting, 'Hang on fellows. Help will be here in a short time. Now kill one for me.'

"He refused all rations, telling his buddies that he didn't deserve them because he couldn't fight.

"When it became apparent that the help wasn't going to arrive, he ordered his men to attempt to return to friendly lines. When the position was abandoned, he refused to burden the men because of his helpless condition.

"When last seen, he was wearing a smile and was wishing the survivors the best of luck on their way out.

"His cheerfulness, fortitude, and unflinching acceptance of fate's decree was a predominant influence in the magnificent defense of the gallant band who held the observation post for 4 days and nights of hell."

Sergeant Watkins, who was 29 years old at the time of his death, attended grammar and high school at Turnertown, Tex. He enlisted in the Army on June 6, 1939, at Dallas, Tex., and served in the Pacific theater during World War II. He was awarded the Bronze Star for exemplary conduct in ground combat against the enemy during the Guadalcanal campaign.

The Medal of Honor citation follows:

"Sergeant Watkins, Company H, Ninth Infantry Regiment, distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action against an enemy near Yongsan, Korea, from August 31 through September 3, 1950. When an overwhelming enemy force broke through and isolated 30 men of his unit he took command, established a perimeter defense and directed action which repelled continuous, fanatical enemy assaults. With his group completely surrounded and cut off, he moved from fox hole to fox hole exposing himself to enemy fire, giving instructions and offering encouragement to his men. Later when the need for ammunition and grenades became critical he shot two enemy soldiers 50 yards outside the perimeter and went out alone for their ammunition and weapons. As he picked up their weapons he was attacked by three others and wounded. Returning their fire he killed all three and gathering up the weapons of the five enemy dead returned to his amazed comrades. During a later assault, six enemy soldiers gained a defiladed spot and began to throw grenades into the perimeter making it untenable. Realizing the desperate situation and disregarding his wound he rose from his fox hole to engage them with rifle fire. Although immediately hit by a burst from an enemy machine gun he continued to fire until he had killed the grenade throwers. With this threat eliminated he collapsed and despite being paralyzed from the waist down, encouraged his men to hold on. He refused all food saving it for his comrades and when it became apparent that help would not arrive in time to hold the position ordered his men to escape to friendly lines. Refusing evacuation as his hopeless condition would burden his comrades he remained in his position and cheerfully wished them luck. Through his aggressive leadership and intrepid actions, this small force destroyed nearly 500 of the enemy before abandoning their position."

OKLAHOMA ARMY LIEUTENANT AWARDED MEDAL OF HONOR

First Lt. Frederick F. Henry, Clinton, Okla., who is officially listed as missing in action in Korea, has been awarded the Medal of Honor for sacrificing himself to cover a withdrawal of his platoon in action near Am-Dong, Korea, September 1, 1950, the Department of the Army announced today.

The medal will be presented by President Truman in a White House ceremony, at 11 a. m., January 9, 1951, to Mrs. Lavon P. Henry, 1045 Harvard, Salt Lake City, Utah, the hero's wife.

A graphic description of the action which won the Medal of Honor for Lieutenant Henry was given by Sgt. (then Corp.) Richard A. Siman, 7222 Oxford Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., a member of his platoon who was sharing the officer's foxhole when the action started.

"A bunch of North Koreans attacked our position," Sergeant Siman said. "Lieutenant Henry jumped up out of the hole and started running down the line telling his men to stay in place and keep firing.

"He came back a few minutes later and I saw he was wounded in the shoulder. He seemed to be in great pain.

"We fought the enemy for a long time, and it seemed as if we were stopping them. Lieutenant Henry tried to call battalion on the phone, but the line was out. He said he wasn't sure if the rest of the outfit was completely ready so we had to stay put.

"There were bullets and shells falling all around. Our ammunition was running low.

"Lieutenant Henry sent me out after the guns and ammunition of the wounded. When I came back, he put them in the hole with him and told the men to start withdrawing, and he would cover us.

"We started back, and Lieutenant Henry stayed by himself. He seemed to be firing everything at once.

"I didn't see Lieutenant Henry after that."

The action in Korea was not the first time Lieutenant Henry, who is 33 years old, has served in a hero's role. Entering active duty as an enlisted man in 1935, he won a combat promotion to second lieutenant in the Pacific theater on February 12, 1945. He holds the Asiatic Pacific theater ribbon with two bronze stars for New Guinea and Luzon, the Philippines Liberation ribbon with bronze star, and the Bronze Star Medal with a s oak leaf cluster.

Attending the White House ceremony, besides his wife, will be two children, Frederick F. Henry, Jr., 3 years old, and Sharon M. Henry, 14 months old; his father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. James P. Henry, Riverview, Apartment 11, Stockton, Calif., and a sister-in-law, Mrs. Janna Henry, 1025 Acosta, Salinas, Calif.

Following is the Medal of Honor citation:

"Lieutenant Henry, Company F, Thirty-eighth Infantry Regiment, distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond call of duty in action on September 1, 1950, in the vicinity of Am-Dong, Korea. His platoon was holding a strategic ridge near the town when they were attacked by a superior enemy force, supported by heavy mortar and artillery fire. Seeing his platoon disorganized by this fanatical assault he left his fox hole and moving along the line ordered his men to stay in place and keep firing. Encouraged by this heroic action the platoon re-formed a defense line and rained devastating fire on the enemy, checking his advance. Enemy fire had knocked out all communications and Lieutenant Henry was unable to determine whether or not the main line of resistance was alerted to this heavy attack. On his own initiative, although severely wounded, he decided to hold his position as long as possible and ordered the wounded evacuated and their weapons and ammunition brought to him. Establishing a one-man defensive position he ordered the platoon's withdrawal and, despite his wound and with complete disregard for himself, remained behind to cover the movement. When last seen he was single-handedly firing all available weapons so effectively that he caused an estimated 50 enemy casualties. His ammunition was soon expended and his position overrun, but this intrepid action saved the platoon and halted the enemy's advance until the main line of resistance was prepared to throw back the attack. Lieutenant Henry's outstanding gallantry and noble self-sacrifice, above and beyond the call of duty, reflects the highest honor upon him and was in keeping with the esteemed traditions of the Army of the United States."

PRESIDENT TO PRESENT MEDAL OF HONOR AWARDED GENERAL DEAN TO MRS. DEAN

A detailed summary of the events leading to the disappearance in Korea at 1:30 a. m. on July 21, 1950, of Maj. Gen. William F. Dean, heroic commander of the 24th Infantry Division, was released today by the Department of the Army as the Nation prepared to bestow its highest award, the Medal of Honor, on the missing military leader.

The medal, which was awarded to General Dean because of his "examples of excessive gallantry committed always at the threatened portions of his front lines," will be presented to his wife, Mrs. Mildred D. Dean, 251 Etna Street, Berkeley, Calif., by President Truman in a White House ceremony at 11:30 a. m. January 9, 1951.

Also attending the ceremony will be the general's mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Dean, and his daughter, Mrs. June Williams, both of Berkeley, and a son, Cadet William F. Dean, Jr., a student at the United States Military Academy.

The events prior to General Dean's disappearance were recorded by Brig. Gen. Pearson Menoher, assistant commander of the Twenty-fourth Infantry Division. His summation follows:

"In order to fully develop General Dean's actions during July 19–21, 1950, it is desired to present here all available background material, some of it gained by observation, most of it by personal discussion with General Dean.

"General Dean fully realized that his division could not alone stem the North Korean Army. He did believe that we could considerably delay the enemy at Taejon since it was the strategic key to any advance on the Taegu-Pusan main line of communications in this portion of South Korea, and the enemy would not attempt any farther advance south until he captured this city. He had hoped to hold Taejon until reinforcements could arrive; if this were not possible he intended to inflict the heaviest of casualties upon the enemy. Throughout the delaying action he commanded from July 2 until July 21, when he was reported missing, he repeatedly stated, 'My God, we must hold them; I don't want to have to fight for every mile of this ground again.'

"Thus it was that when our Kum River line was broken and we withdrew to the vicinity of Taejon he knew that the enemy would soon attack here and in a strength greatly outnumbering us. On July 18, 1950, he ordered the Twenty-fourth Infantry Division Advance CP to move to Okchon, 12 miles southeast of Taejon. He kept with him in Taejon a minimum staff consisting of several officers and enlisted drivers.

"All day July 19, 1950, the enemy bombarded our positions north of Taejon in the vicinity of the air strip in preparation for their attack. General Dean stated this artillery barrage was greater than any he had seen in any single day during his 7 months of combat in Europe, 1944–45.

"Despite this artillery he made numerous trips to the front lines to see for himself what the enemy was doing or could be expected to do. On one of these trips he went out in front of our lines to direct the fire of an American tank against approaching enemy. Even though artillery and small arms fire was falling in this area, he stood outside the tank and directed its fire with marked effect.

"On another occasion he visited an advance CP where incoming artillery was particularly heavy and ate lunch in the mess even though other officers deemed it more appropriate to remain in their fox holes.

"Late that afternoon General Dean returned to his division forward CP at Okchon. I insisted that he should remain at his own CP and that if he wanted a general officer with the regimental combat team in Taejon he should send me there. He declined, stating that he wanted to be there himself, that he would be all right and would see me later. He returned to Taejon around 1800.

"Around daylight July 20, 1950, the enemy launched a coordinated attack, probably consisting of two divisions, against Taejon. Our forces, an understrength regimental combat team, were greatly outnumbered. The first evidence of this attack was the appearance of several enemy tanks within Taejon at approximately 0530. General Dean quickly organized bazooka crews and took off in pursuit. During this hunt he spotted a disabled enemy tank in a field on the western edge of Taejon. He directed the fire of a 75 millimeter recoilless rifle against this tank but after firing four rounds without a hit, he started crawling toward the tank with a hand grenade, intending to hurl it into an open hatch.

"While crawling toward the tank he was pinned down by enemy small arms fire; at the same time two other enemy tanks appeared to cover the withdrawal of this disabled vehicle. In getting away he evacuated an abandoned American jeep. He hurriedly rounded up several bazooka teams and returned to knock out the three enemy tanks; however, by this time the tanks had headed away from Taejon and the bazooka crews firing at a range of 200 yards were unable to hit them.

"At approximately 1130 while eating lunch at the Thirty-fourth Infantry CP in Taejon another enemy tank rolled past. Again General Dean secured bazooka teams and started another chase. Upon spotting the tank down a side street he placed one bazooka team on this street to prevent its escape and with the other team he proceeded down a street to the rear and paralleling the tank to gain undetected a good firing position nearer the tank.

"Trying to find such a position in the upstairs of one building a sniper fired on him twice, both shots narrowly missing his head. Unperturbed he had a rifleman return the sniper's fire, the third round hitting and apparently killing the sniper. After several more tries he found a position upstairs in a building from which he could look down directly on top of the tank. He then had the bazooka team fire three rounds into the tank, killing the crew, and setting the tank afire.

"Between these tank hunts, General Dean made frequent trips to our front lines despite heavy enemy fire, and always returned to the Thirty-fourth Infantry CP with targets for our air cover. He minutely directed these air strikes to insure that our own troops were not hit. Had he not made these personal reconnaissances the air strikes would not have been possible.

"Around 1530 to 1630 it was obvious that all our positions were being overrun. General Dean then formed a convoy of all available vehicles left in the town and ordered a withdrawal. Asked if he wanted to proceed with the lead elements, he declined stating to the effect he wanted to see everybody else safely out of town. He proceeded with the last vehicles.

"The column first ran into enemy small arms fire in the southwest edge of Taejon. In its procession for the next 3½ to 4 miles the column with few exceptions was constantly under enemy small arms and mortar fire.

"At the edge of Taejon six or seven soldiers on foot asked for a ride. He stopped, put the men aboard and told his driver to proceed down the road to a covered position where he would join them on foot. On three other occasions he stopped his jeep while under fire to clear the road of disabled or driverless vehicles. Each time he found operable vehicles, he assigned a driver, and placed all wounded men in the vicinity aboard.

"At one point a truck received a direct hit from an enemy mortar round; the truck had run off the road into a ditch and 10 to 15 of our dead lay in the middle of the road. General Dean ordered his driver to slow down and veer off, even though it looked as if they would run off the road.

"About 4 miles out of Taejon, the motor convoy was completely stopped by knocked-out vehicles. General Dean gathered all the men in his vicinity, leading them to temporary concealment in a nearby bean field. After dark he led his group to nearby hills. He helped carry a wounded man up the hill which was very steep and 'rough-going' for an able man on his own feet. He left his group here, stating he and his aide-de-camp were going back down the hill to round up additional stragglers and wounded.

"While on this mission General Dean and his aide became separated around 0130, 21 July 1950. Neither in the darkness that night nor after daylight the following morning could he be found. This is the last eyewitness account of General Dean available at this time.

"It is more than evident that in all his actions against the enemy he was fearless, aggressive, and that he proceeded with utter disregard for his own life. His numerous appearances on the fighting front under fire immeasurably boosted the morale of his troops. Throughout it all he remained calm and cheerful, a difficult task for a normal man under such adverse conditions.

"His intrepid leadership and outstanding valor uphold the highest tradition of the military service. On behalf of the men serving with him at the time of these related incidents, I am proud to recommend General Dean for the award of the Medal of Honor."

In his recommendation that General Dean be awarded the Medal of Honor, General Douglas MacArthur, as Commander in Chief, Far East Command, wrote:

"It is with great pride and warmest personal admiration that I recommend the award of the Medal of Honor to Maj. Gen. William F. Dean. The dauntless courage and the selflessness demonstrated by General Dean bespeak the noble character of our brave men who are fighting for a unified cause under the flag of the United Nations."

The late Gen. Walton H. Walker, former Commander of the Eighth Army, who was killed in a jeep accident on December 23, 1950, before his death wrote the following:

"I consider it a privilege to approve a recommendation for the award of the Medal of Honor to this gallant and intrepid general officer. Never in the annals of military history has a general officer written a saga that can compare with this."

Following is the Medal of Honor citation:

"General Dean, Commanding General, Twenty-fourth Infantry Division, distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at the repeated risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty in Taejon, Korea, on 20 and 21 July 1950. In command of a unit suddenly relieved from occupation duties in Japan and as yet untried in combat; faced with a ruthless and determined enemy, highly trained and overwhelmingly superior in numbers; he felt it his duty to take action which to a man of his military experience and knowledge was clearly apt to result in his death. He personally and alone attacked an enemy tank while armed only with a hand grenade. He also directed the fire of his own tanks from an exposed position with neither cover nor concealment while under observed artillery and small arms fire. When the town of Taejon was finally overrun he refused to insure his own safety by leaving with the leading elements but remained behind organizing his retreating forces, directing stragglers, and was last seen assisting the wounded to a place of safety. These actions indicate that General Dean felt it necessary to sustain the courage and resolution of his troops by examples of excessive gallantry committed always at the threatened portions of his front lines. The magnificent response of his unit to this willing and cheerful sacrifice, made with full knowledge of its certain cost, is history. The success of this phase of the campaign is in large measure due to General Dean's heroic leadership, courageous and loyal devotion to his men, and his complete disregard for personal safety."

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE HENRY L. STIMSON

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, next Sunday afternoon, January 21, at 5 p. m., at the National Presbyterian Church, Connecticut Avenue at N Street NW., memorial services will be held in commemoration of the life, character, and public service of the late Henry L. Stimson. Speakers will be Gen. George C. Marshall and the Reverend Dr. Albert J. McCartney. I have been asked to announce that Members of Congress are invited to attend.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted, without debate, to transact routine business, such as the introduction of bills and to place matters in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF LIGNITE RESEARCH LABORATORY, GRAND FORKS, N. DAK.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, on the activities of, expenditures by, and donations to the Lignite Research Laboratory, Grand Forks, N. Dak.; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

PLIGHT OF TRANSYLVANIA SAXONS—RESOLUTION OF STEUBEN SOCIETY OF AMERICA, NEW YORK

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, in connection with the magnificent fight put up by the Germans in Western Germany against communism, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Steuben Society of America, in New York, requesting an investigation and study of the plight of the Transylvania Saxons.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF THE STEUBEN SOCIETY OF AMERICA

Whereas the American people subscribe to the fundamental principle of the protection of human rights, and to the practice of charity and good will; and

Whereas we have heretofore subscribed to the principles enunciated in the Atlantic Charter abhoring the practice of territorial self-aggrandizement and advocating self-determination and the pursuit of the four freedoms in all countries everywhere; and

Whereas the Saxon people of Transylvania, Rumania, have by reason of the failures and shortcomings of American representatives at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam, been caused, unnecessarily, by reason of their German ethnic origin, to suffer and endure diabolic hardships, and to live in the shadow of Draconic laws unexperienced in 800 years of Transylvania-Saxon history; and

Whereas the policy heretofore pursued of "to the victor belong the spoils," reinforced by the spirit of vindictiveness and vengeance, has confronted these oppressed people with only a dark and hopeless future,

Now, therefore, the Steuben Society of America in the interests of American honor and prestige, does hereby advocate and request the creation of a duly authorized Government commission, under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States to investigate and study the plight of the Transylvania Saxons, and report its recommendations to the end that said conditions affecting the fate and destiny of these people may, in the interests of fairness and justice, be alleviated and remedied.

Respectfully submitted.

THEO. H. HOFFMANN,
National Chairman.

THE HARWOOD CASE—AID FOR AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS—RESOLUTION OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COMMISSIONERS, SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, in conference with the Commissioner of Agriculture for my State of South Carolina, the Honorable J. Roy Jones requested my assistance in obtaining aid for the agricultural interests of the Nation.

Commissioner Jones is chairman of the Transportation Committee of the National Association of Commissioners, Secretaries and Directors of Agriculture. This organization at its last annual meeting unanimously approved a resolution that I would like to obtain permission for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The action requested in the resolution should be forthcoming and a favorable decision is expected but, irrespective of the decision made, it should be released immediately.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION I: REGARDING HARWOOD CASE

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission in June 1948 reopened the Harwood case and at the same time instituted a general investigation for the determination of exempted agricultural commodities; and

Whereas the commissioners of agriculture of various States testified at the Commission's hearings in Washington, D. C., in November 1948, and in Atlanta, Ga., in January 1949, emphasizing the vital importance of exempt truck transportation in the marketing of agricultural commodities; and

Whereas the examiner assigned to the case rendered his report and submitted findings in these proceedings in July 1949, wherein he recommended a reversal of the Commission's prior decision in the Harwood case and classified as exempt commodities a great number of agricultural commodities previously held nonexempt by the Commission; and

Whereas oral argument in these proceedings was heard by the entire Commission in December 1949; and

Whereas the Commission has taken no further action in this litigation, notwithstanding the importance of the outcome to the agricultural community, and continues to render decisions under its previously restrictive interpretations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this association request the Interstate Commerce Commission to render its decision in this matter without further delay, adopting the report of the examiner.

CLEAR CHANNEL—RESOLUTION OF THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, DALLAS, TEX.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted at the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation at Dallas, Tex., in opposition to any reduction, by international treaty or otherwise, in the number of clear channel stations.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLEAR CHANNEL RESOLUTION OF THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

News and information are of increasing importance to everyone. Many rural people depend upon clear channel radio broadcasting for news, weather reports, and agricultural information. We therefore firmly oppose any reduction, by international treaty or otherwise, in the number of clear channel stations or any interruption of the extent of their service. The American Farm Bureau Federation urges that permission be given to these stations to increase their power to allow for complete coverage to all areas in their respective territories.

Passed December 14, 1950, at the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation at Dallas, Tex.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS (S. REPT. NO. 2)

Mr. McFARLAND (for Mr. SPARKMAN), from the Select Committee on Small Business, submitted, pursuant to Senate Resolution 58, Eighty-first Congress, the annual report of the Select Committee on Small Business, which was ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS, EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS (S. REPT. NO. 1)

Mr. McCLELLAN submitted, pursuant to law, a report on the activities of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments during the Eighty-first Congress, which was ordered to be printed.

WIRE TAPPING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], the Senator from California [Mr. NIXON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], and myself, members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I submit minority views on wire tapping in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that they be printed as part 2 of Report No. 2700, Eighty-first Congress, second session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The minority views will be received, and, without objection, printed as requested by the Senator from New Jersey.

WITHDRAWAL OF UNITED STATES FROM UNITED NATIONS—USE OF ARMED FORCES TO PROTECT THE ISLAND OF FORMOSA

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I introduce two joint resolutions and request that they lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolutions will be received and lie on the table as requested.

The joint resolutions introduced by Mr. EASTLAND were read twice by their titles and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

S. J. Res. 14. Joint resolution to provide for withdrawal of the United States from the United Nations if Communist China is admitted to membership therein; and

S. J. Res. 15. Joint resolution to provide for use of the Armed Forces of the United States in defense of Formosa.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement at this time, explanatory of the two joint resolutions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Mississippi may proceed.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I have this day introduced two joint resolutions, the first of which provides that the United States shall withdraw from the United Nations if Communist China is admitted thereto, and the second provides that the armed services of the United States protect the island of Formosa from conquest or occupation by any Communist state or power.

I have introduced these joint resolutions because of the new policy of the State Department, which means surrender to Communist China.

Mr. President, at a later date I shall speak at length on these joint resolutions. I have introduced them, however, because I do not believe these great questions, which mean life or death to the United States, should be decided by back-door deals by officials in the State Department in whom the American people have no confidence.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will yield, let me ask if he will be willing to have the joint resolutions read so that we may know what he is talking about?

Mr. EASTLAND. I have just obtained unanimous consent to explain them, and am doing so at this time.

Mr. President, I have reluctantly reached the conclusion that the State Department as now constituted cannot protect the welfare of the United States. The under-the-table deal at Lake Success on last Saturday was the last straw.

Formosa is necessary for the defense of the United States, and is today one of the great bulwarks of power against the spread of Communist aggression. It appears that our State Department is willing to surrender this island and sacrifice the last great anti-Communist army in the Orient.

Mr. President, what are we thinking of? What is behind these decisions? They must be properly aired and the American people must know and pass judgment on those who would promulgate such a program. If Formosa is surrendered, the very least that can be said is that the task of the United States in the defense of Japan and the Philippines will be weakened and our defense line in the Pacific breached. It would take thousands of American lives to regain what would be lost by this surrender. To admit Communist China into the United Nations and surrender Formosa to the aggressor, whose hands drip with the blood of thousands of American boys, is an insult to the dead and would be a betrayal of the United States.

Communist China today is a bigger aggressor than the Soviet Union because Communist China has resorted to armed warfare for the purpose of aggression. In addition, she wages war against the United Nations itself. To admit her to membership in an organization to preserve the peace would certainly destroy any chance of future effectiveness of this organization, and its continued existence would stand out as a mockery and a fraud upon the highest aspirations of mankind.

Mr. President, this country, in all probability, cannot survive further blunders; and the American Congress must act to protect the Nation. The few remarks that I desire to make at this time are based primarily on the power of Congress under the Constitution of the United States to direct our armed services to protect Formosa from attack. Some people will conscientiously say that the Congress has no such power, but that this power rests in the hands of the President of the United States because he is the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the country and is charged wtih the conduct of our foreign policy.

With this argument, I entirely disagree. The Congress of the United States under the Constitution has the sole power to direct the Armed Forces of the United States to make war upon any given country. This is all that a declaration of war means. Congress lays down the policy, while the President, as the Commander in Chief, determines how, when, and where the Armed Forces shall attack. This means that in the case of Formosa the Congress has the sole power to say when military measures shall be resorted to for the protection of any area; and the President, as the Commander in Chief, acting in furtherance of this policy, determines how, when, and where action is necessary to protect the area in question.

The sole power to declare war carries with it all incidental powers; and inasmuch as the Congress possesses the sole power to declare war, it necessarily follows that Congress has the power to direct the defense of any area.

There is no doubt that the Congress has the power, under the Constitution of the United States, to direct the armed services of the United States to attack any country. If we have the power to direct attack, we certainly have the power to direct the armed defense of any area.

COMMISSION ON DISLOYALTY AND SECURITY

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am today resubmitting a resolution which I offered at the second session of the Eighty-first Congress establishing a commission to ascertain the facts with respect to disloyalty in the State Department and security of the Department against foreign penetration. The commission is to be bipartisan, highly trained, and wholly independent of the executive.

In the struggle for existence in which the United States is engaged, the State Department is in the front line of our defense. It is thus essential that confidence in the State Department be definitely restored once and for all.

Confidence cannot be achieved by investigation of the executive by the Executive.

Confidence cannot be achieved by Congress undertaking an investigation which it has neither the time nor the training nor the facilities to perform.

But confidence can be restored by an investigation which is independent of the Executive, which is created by and responsible to Congress and which is conducted by highly qualified persons.

Such an investigation will result in cleaning out the unfit and in ending any unjustified suspicion of the many fine men and women who work in the State Department.

This legislation was first recommended in the individual report which I filed as a member of the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee on disloyalty charges in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD at this point excerpts from this report which bear on this matter together with the full text of the resolution. I hope that it may be promptly considered and acted upon so that the commission can be speedily appointed and go to work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the excerpts and the text of the resolution will be printed in the body of the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 27) submitted by Mr. LODGE was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That (a) with a view to ascertaining the facts with respect to disloyalty on the part of employees of the Department of State and security of the Department against foreign penetration and taking appropriate action with respect thereto, there is hereby established a bipartisan senatorial commission to be known as the Commission on Disloyalty and Security (in this resolution referred to as the "Commission") to be composed of eight members appointed as follows:

(1) Two members who are Senators, one from each of the two major political parties, to be appointed by the President of the Senate;

(2) Three members from private life to be appointed by the President of the Senate upon the recommendation of the majority leader of the Senate;

(3) Three members from private life to be appointed by the President of the Senate upon the recommendation of the minority leader of the Senate.

(b) The six members of the Commission who are not Members of the Senate shall be comprised of persons who as a result of training, experience, and attainments are exceptionally qualified to ascertain the facts with respect to the matters referred to in subsection (a) and to make recommendations with respect thereto.

(c) All appointees to the Commission shall be confirmed by the Senate.

(d) The persons recommended by the majority leader of the Senate shall be approved by a majority vote of the Senators of the majority conference, and the persons recommended by the minority leader of the Senate shall be approved by a majority vote of the Senators of the minority conference.

(e) Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(f) The Commission shall elect a Chairman and a Vice Chairman from among its members.

(g) Five members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 2. (a) Members of the Senate who are members of the Commission shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as Senators; but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

(b) The members from private life shall each receive $50 per diem when engaged in the performance of duties vested in the Commission, plus reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of such duties.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution, the Commission, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized (1) to appoint and fix the compensation of such experts, consultants, and clerical and stenographic assistants as it deems necessary and advisable, but the compensation so fixed shall not exceed the compensation prescribed under the Classification Act of 1949, for comparable duties; and (2) to hold such hearings; to sit and act at such times and places; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths, to take such testimony; to have such printing and binding done; and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services in reporting hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per 100 words. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the Chairman or any member of the Commission designated by him and shall be served by any person designated by the Chairman or any such member.

SEC. 4. (a) The Commission shall study and investigate fully charges of disloyalty on the part of persons who have been or are now employed by the Department of State. All proceedings of the Commission shall be conducted in secret.

(b) Upon concluding its study and investigation, the Commission shall make a public announcement of its findings no later than 6 months after the enactment of this resolution, and shall make a report thereon to the Senate with such recommendations as it deems advisable. Such report may be made to the Secretary of the Senate if the Senate is not in session. Upon the submission of such report the Commission shall cease to exist.

SEC. 5. The expenses of the Commission under this resolution, which shall not exceed $——, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers signed by the Chairman.

The excerpts presented by Mr. LODGE are as follows:

BIPARTISAN, TRAINED, INDEPENDENT COMMISSION

An important element of strength in our system of government is that our checks and balances give us as a people the opportunity to criticize ourselves. In a dictatorship, the dictator is free to do whatever he wants—and this includes freedom to make irretrievable mistakes. It has been said that if Hitler had had an independent body like Congress to criticize and challenge his decisions that some of his worst blunders would have been avoided and that he might have won the war. It is certainly true that in this country the existence of a Congress, independent of the Executive and able to make a check at the top level of policy decision without regard to the administrative chain of command, is as complete a theoretical—and in most instances practical—protection against error as the people could have.

When this general truth is applied to the specific subject of this investigation—the existence of disloyalty in the State Department—it becomes immediately obvious that the unique asset which a congressional committee has—that of being independent of the Executive—is, under our present way to doing things, accompanied by the following very serious draw-backs:

1. There is primarily the matter of time. To accomplish fully an investigation of this kind the members of a congressional committee clearly lack enough time because of the fact that they have a great many other pressing public duties.

2. They also are not men who have the technical expertness which is required to make a study of this sort.

3. The tools which a congressional committee has—which are essentially the tools of publicity and development of facts for the use of public opinion—are precisely the implements which cannot be used effectively when it comes to tracking down disloyal persons in the Government departments. This requires long, patient detective work which is obviously something which no congressional committee is in a position to do.

4. Finally, the setting up of a congressional committee on a majority-minority basis inescapably introduces political considerations into a subject where they very definitely have no place whatever.

The result of all these draw-backs became plain during the course of the 1950 investigation, which had a number of unfortunate results, including the besmirching of the reputations of innocent persons, the hampering of the work of the Government investigative agencies, the impairment of the position of the United States before the world, and an unjust reflection on all of the happily numerous excellent men and women who work in the State Department, with the resulting discouragement to other excellent men and women from going to work for the State Department. This was a loss to the country as a whole.

It must, therefore, be obvious that it would be highly desirable if an investigation could take place which would be a completely independent audit of the Executive and yet was not encumbered by these very serious drawbacks.

The other protection which the American people have against foreign penetration of their foreign policy is in the executive branch, where the security personnel of the State Department, the loyalty boards of the State Department, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation work together to protect the public interests. Unlike Members of Congress, these persons have the time to do the work, they have the technical expertness which is required, and they possess all of the tools which are needed to do the job. They have detectives and listening devices and all the rest of the paraphernalia. The shortcoming is that they are under the Executive, and it is a basic American instinct that it is not human nature to expect an impartial audit of the Executive by the Executive any more than it would be human nature to expect an impartial audit of the Congress by the Congress.

This must bring one to the obvious conclusion that the desirable goal would be an official group of persons who had the time and the technical expertness and the tools to do the job—who were as proficient in their way as the FBI is in its way—and who were, at the same time, as independent of the Executive as is the Congress.

I believe that the concern over this question of disloyalty has risen to such a point that a quicker result and a greater amount of public confidence would be achieved by a simple Senate resolution which would set up a bipartisan commission of 8 persons, 2 of whom would be Senators, 3 of whom would be appointed by the Vice President upon the recommendation of the majority leader, and 3 of whom would be appointed by the Vice President upon the recommendation of the minority leader. The minority leader's selections would have to be approved by a majority vote of the conference of minority Senators, and the majority leader's selections would have to be approved by a majority vote of the Senators of the majority conference. All members would require confirmation by the entire Senate.

The six nonsenatorial persons would be chosen because of their qualifications to pass on a subject of this kind. They are instructed under the terms of this bill to conduct all their proceedings in secret, making a public announcement of their findings at the end, at a date which will be well after the forthcoming election. They would have the power of subpena and completely adequate funds.

This resolution is confined to the Senate because it is here that the original investigation began and ran its course, because the Senate has a unique interest in foreign relations, and because to confine it to the Senate will save a great deal of time. This bill adopts some of the following time-tested features of the bill which set up the Hoover Commission, to wit: The nomination of two Senators to the Commission to provide liaison with Congress and the composition of the Commission with equal representation from both parties.

A Senate resolution can obviously be passed more rapidly than legislation which requires the concurrence of the House and of the Executive. The congressional character of this bill and the fact that it is entirely bipartisan should insure that whatever results were announced would command the maximum amount of public confidence from precisely those elements of public opinion which now lack confidence the most. One of the purposes of such a study must obviously be to provide a clean way to end this business. It will never end at all, cleanly or otherwise, if the practice of having the majority party investigate the majority continues to hold sway. Nor would satisfactory results be obtained if the minority investigated the majority. The investigation must be nonpolitical.

Past history indicates that Congress, when it acts through investigating committees, often acts incompetently and frequently fails in its important task of compelling disclosures. Congress delayed a long time before it finally decided to employ competent people to do its legislative drafting. There was another long delay before Congress decided to set up its own corps of experts on internal revenue taxation and the other expert staffs without which Congress could not function at all today. This process of evolution should continue. We have delayed far too long in the business of setting up congressional investigations on a modern and practical basis. Where foreign governments, proceeding in secret with trained men have achieved prompt results in rooting out espionage, we, with our circus-like proceedings, have bagged only a corporal's guard. Clearly our system is faulty. The setting up of an efficient and independent investigative procedure is long overdue.

EX OFFICIO MEMBERSHIP ON COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS OF MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. BRICKER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 28), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the table contained in subparagraph 6 (a) of rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Senate Members of Joint Committee on Atomic Energy	"Development and Utilization of Atomic Energy"

ADDITIONAL TRANS-ATLANTIC PASSENGER SERVICE AT LOWER COST

Mr. BREWSTER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 29), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Whereas travel by United States residents contributes to the creation of vitally needed dollar exchange in European countries; and

Whereas lack of adequate trans-Atlantic passenger service during the summer season at rates within the reach of the middle-income market is limiting the extent of such travel: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Civil Aeronautics Board and the United States Maritime Commission are requested (1) to explore every available means of providing additional trans-Atlantic passenger service at lower cost, including maximum utilization of existing service under special low-fare arrangements, charters, and group contracts, and (2) if they find their existing authority inadequate to facilitate and encourage such low-cost transportation, to recommend to the Senate such legislation as may be necessary to enable them to accomplish such objective.

RELIEF FOR FISHING INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BREWSTER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 30), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas the fishing industry is an important part of the economy of the United States; and

Whereas the growing population of the Nation emphasizes the increasing future importance of fish as a food; and

Whereas the men and equipment of the fishing fleets and the shore workers engaged in the preparation of the catches, and the food resource thereby made available, have been demonstrated in two world wars to be necessary to the national defense; and

Whereas operations of much of the fishing industry have been seriously curtailed by reason of steadily growing imports of fish and fishery products, particularly of fresh and frozen groundfish fillets, and there is reason to believe that similar conditions are imminent in the tuna industry on the Pacific coast; and

Whereas if the present trend is permitted to continue, the fishing industry will, within a short time, be so impaired as to force out of business a major portion of the fishing fleet of the United States and force out of employment a major portion of the workmen employed in various phases of the industry; and

Whereas the domestic fishing industry has already been adversely affected and is further seriously threatened by the consistently increasing importations of fish and fishery products into the United States; and

Whereas the imported fish are caught by workmen whose wage scale and standard of living are far below those of Americans in like occupations; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the resulting lower cost of fish in their primary foreign market, the finally processed product is sold to the American housewife at the same price as the domestic fish; and

Whereas representatives of the fishing industry and others from many parts of the United States recently appeared before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives and attested to the facts hereinbefore stated; and

Whereas the foregoing indicates the need for an immediate study and investigation of the cause and effect of a situation that will, if not corrected, result in the serious impairment of the oldest and one of the most important food-producing industries in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, requested to cause an immediate study to be made of—

(1) the differences in the costs of domestic production of fresh and frozen fish, especially groundfish fillets, and the costs of foreign production of similar fish; and

(2) the effect on the domestic fishing industry of increasing imports of fresh and frozen fish, especially groundfish fillets, into the United States, and, with the advice of, and in coordination with, the Department of State, the Department of Agriculture, the United States Tariff Commission, the Bureau of Customs of the Department of the Treasury, and other appropriate executive departments and independent agencies of the Government to recommend means by which the United States fishing industry may survive and be saved harmless against the inroads of foreign-caught and foreign-processed fish; and that, because of the urgency of the situation, he be and hereby is requested to make his report and recommendation to the Senate within 30 days after the adoption of this resolution.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY FOR INVESTIGATION OF RELATIONSHIP OF UNITED STATES WITH INDIANS

Mr. O'MAHONEY, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 32), which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the authority of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, under Senate Resolution 292, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to July 13, 1950 (to investigate the relations of the United States with the Indians and Indian tribes), is hereby continued through June 30, 1951.

CONTINUATION OF AUTHORITY FOR INVESTIGATION OF FUEL RESERVES AND FORMULATION OF FUEL POLICY

Mr. O'MAHONEY, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 33), which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the authority of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, under Senate Resolution 239, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to August 15, 1950, and as further extended by Senate Resolution 374, agreed to December 21, 1950 (providing for a study and investigation of the fuel reserves and to formulate a fuel policy of the United States), is hereby continued through June 30, 1951.

VISITORS TO THE SENATE FROM MORAL REARMAMENT ASSEMBLY

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to say a brief word of welcome to some distinguished visitors who are with us today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to a group of distinguished visitors who are seated in the gallery today. They come from the Moral Re-Armament Assembly, which has been in session at the Shoreham Hotel here in Washington and has included 1,500 delegates from 25 countries. Among them are military, political, industrial and labor leaders from the danger areas of Europe and Asia. They bring evidence of an ideological force for democracy that is seeking to bring an answer to communism in those areas. Among them also are men who, up to a few months ago, were leaders of the Communist Party in western Germany and who are now fighting on the democratic side.

Mr. President, along with our military and economic strategy America more than ever needs to develop ideological strength if we are to win what is primarily a struggle for the minds of men and women. It is not enough for us to expose the weaknesses and evils of those who threaten our way of life and even our existence. We as a people must live and proclaim the inspired experience of our democracy based on moral standards in which alone can freedom survive and flourish. Freedom under God is the big issue in the world today.

Mr. President, these men and women of all races and all creeds, and of widely varying views on life, come together in one common purpose. They are making a distinct contribution to the cause to which I refer. They merit our attention and support.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute along the line of the remarks which the Senator from New Jersey has just made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. HILL. I am gratified that my good friend, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, has spoken as he has. I wish to associate myself with his remarks. I have long felt that the world needed the consuming fire of a great spiritual revival to dispel the evils of materialism and selfishness.

In the Moral Re-Armament movement we have an idea. Ideas are more powerful than bullets or bombs. The Moral Re-Armament movement proclaims an idea for the marshaling and building of the spiritual forces of the world to bring understanding to men and peace to the world. The world today, confused and confounded, is groping for light. The Moral Re-Armament movement holds aloft a great light for the world's guidance. It would lift the world to Him who taught us to pray, and who came to save the world. In His name and with His power, in the faith of our fathers, we can remove mountains, subdue kingdoms, and bring peace to this troubled world.

I rejoice with the distinguished Senator from New Jersey that we have with us, as the guests of the Senate today, so many of the leaders and representatives of the Moral Re-Armament movement.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I should like to be associated with the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] concerning our visitors in the galleries today. Later in the week, on the anniversary of the birthday of Benjamin Franklin, I shall discuss his life as it relates to peace and the securing of peace in the world. I believe spiritual rearmament or moral rearmament in the world will bring peace rather than material armament alone.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we hear so much nowadays with relation to what is wrong with the world. I want to say a few words on the subject of what is right with the world.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Wisconsin addressing the Senate at this time? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILEY. One of the fine things that is right about the world is the MRA movement. It has been my privilege to attend a number of meetings of that movement in the city of Washington. As those of us who have attended those meetings know, there came from all over the world representatives of labor, representatives of management, representatives of various creeds and religions. They met here in a great convention. One of the things that is right with the world is that they not only talked but they brought men and women here who previously had been literally at each others' throats, in warfare between labor and management, between communism and the Western idea; and these men, as well as women, rose in the meeting here in Washington and in plain unvarnished language told how the moral law, the law of life, the law of compassion, the law of mutual understanding, worked. It eradicated hate, brought about understanding and the desire to work together for the common good.

Now here is an organization that not only talks but breathes into the people who come in contact with it a new spirit. If there is anything the world needs it is the spirit of being willing to sit down and talk one's problems over, understand the other fellow's viewpoint, and learn not to hate him because he differs with you.

Mr. President, I heard some very dramatic utterances at the meetings. I heard former Communists from the Ruhr rise and tell how they hated the people who managed their concerns, 30,000 men were employed in some of them. However, they not only were able to sit down together and discuss their problems with management, but they got to understand each other's viewpoints. The result was that communism went out the window in the minds and souls of the Communists, and they accepted this higher ideology. Strikes were averted, production increased, harmony and understanding resulted.

That is one of the big things that is right with the world, Mr. President, and I am happy to join with my colleagues who have spoken to welcome this group to the Senate. Its members come from afar, from the Far East, and from almost all the lands of Europe—Germany, France, Italy, Switzerland, the Netherlands, England, Scotland, Ireland, Scandinavia. Mind you, some of them are senators in their own countries, and they are here as our guests. So, Mr. President, with your consent, let me ask that they rise; and in view of the tremendous work they are doing to stabilize the thinking and the living of the people of the world, I wish to ask my associates to "give them a hand."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the guests to whom he refers may rise in the gallery, in order that they may be identified. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

[The guests referred to rose from their seats in the gallery, Senators applauding.]

THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 30 seconds to make a comment regarding a passage of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which stands in need of correction. I refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for last Friday, January 12, on page 195, at which appear remarks by Representative SUTTON, in the House of Representatives.

In his speech, reference is made to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. One passage of his speech leaves the impression that the report of the RFC subcommittee will bear out Representative SUTTON's charge that several thousand dollars have been accepted by the officials of RFC in bribes to procure loans.

The report of the subcommittee on the RFC has not yet been prepared, and at the present time no one knows what it will say. However, no charges of bribery will be made in the report because no instances of bribery have been found in the subcommittee's study.

The subcommittee on the RFC will issue its report as soon as it can reasonably do so; and I do not wish to anticipate what it will say, any more than I would endorse the anticipations that others might express.

Not knowing what information may be in Representative SUTTON's possession, I wish not to be placed in the position of supplying an interpretation of his comments. The confidential material supplied to the subcommittee, including executive hearings, has not been made available to Representative SUTTON or anyone else.

NEWS RELATING TO SUPPOSED EXPLOSION OF AN ATOMIC BOMB BY THE RUSSIANS IN SEPTEMBER 1949

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, in a recent issue of the Washington Post a syndicated columnist reported that our scientists are apparently convinced that the Russians exploded an atomic bomb in September 1949. The article further states the present production rate of the Russian's atomic weapons, and forecast a stockpile of more than 100 mobs in the Russians' hands within 2 years.

To my knowledge we in the United States have guarded very secretly our atomic development. We have not made public any details on our rate of production or upon our technical developments.

I have written a letter to the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission asking him if he can tell me whether the information which appeared in the recent column is an accurate report. I have also asked for his comments as to whether making a public statement on Russian production may, in his opinion, jeopardize intelligence sources which may be able to develop accurate information about Russian activities.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter I wrote to Mr. Dean may be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 13, 1951.

Hon. GORDON DEAN,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DEAN: In a recent article printed in the Washington Post, December 31, 1950, statements were made to the effect that our scientists have concluded, by appropriate research, that the Russians exploded an atomic bomb in central Siberia in September 1949. The article went on to state, and I quote:

"Subsequently secret intelligence confirmed the findings made in September 1949. The highest intelligence sources now agree, moreover, that current Soviet bomb output is at the rate of about two a month, and at the end of the coming year will rise to five or more a month. Thus, as of now, the officially estimated Soviet stockpile is about 24 bombs; it will be nearly 50 bombs in another 12 months; and in 2 years, it will be well over 100 bombs. The military significance of this timetable does not need to be underlined."

There has been much discussion about the status of Russian atomic enterprise. We must certainly appreciate that Russia is making every effort to develop atomic weapons, yet I have not heretofore seen any public declaration as to specific development.

I would like to ascertain whether, according to your records, the information stated in this newspaper article is valid. If it is valid, I believe our secret intelligence sources may be jeopardized by making this information public.

Your comments on this matter will be much appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator, Nebraska.

DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS MATERIAL FROM THE WHITE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, many of my colleagues have spoken to me concerning the plan of distribution of the surplus material from the renovation of the White House.

In order to save the time of the Senate, I should like to call attention to a statement made on the floor of the House last Friday by a distinguished Member of the House, the Honorable LOUIS C. RABAUT, of Michigan, which is found on page 191 of the RECORD of January 12.

In a few days we will have on exhibit pieces of this material for the aid of Senators.

SOME OF THE IMPLICATIONS OF AMERICAN SUPPORT OF THE LATEST CEASE-FIRE PROPOSAL AT LAKE SUCCESS

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter I addressed to the Honorable Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, on last Friday, January 12, relative to some of the implications of the vote cast by the United States delegate at the UN on the most recent cease-fire proposal.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 12, 1951.

Hon. DEAN RUSK,
Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: A considerable number of us in the Senate have been quite concerned over the implications of the American support of the latest cease-fire proposal at Lake Success. As I understand the situation from reading the press dispatches, this latest proposal does not require the Chinese Communists to either get out of all of Korea or even to get back north of the thirty-eighth parallel before they participate in the conference. In addition, as I understand it, the nations which definitely will participate in the conference on the settlement of far eastern questions are the Soviet Union, Communist China, Great Britain, and the United States. This looks like a "packed jury." Great Britain has not only recognized Communist China but has consistently thrown obstacles in the way of having the United Nations declare Communist China the aggressor that she is.

They voted in June to declare the movement of North Koreans across the thirty-eighth parallel as aggression and joined in the appeal to the nations of the world to help resist this overt action. Now 2½ months after the Chinese Communists cross the frontier at the Yalu River, Great Britain and some of her other Commonwealth associates have resisted designating Communist China as an aggressor.

This seems to me to be a policy of condemning aggression if committed by a small nation and condoning it if committed by a large nation that has had a measure of success. Very simply this is a doctrine of "might makes right."

In the New York Times of today there is an article by Walter Sullivan, one paragraph of which states: "One of the key points discussed by delegations afterward was the possible outcome of talks between the great powers, including Communist China, on Formosa. Sir Benegal indicated that, in India's view, if today's proposal was carried out faithfully Formosa would be turned over to China."

Since Formosa is now a part of the Republic of China and the Government under President Chiang Kai-shek now has its temporary capital on the island, it is obvious that the representative of the Government of India had reference to the turning of Formosa over to the China which his Government recognizes as the legal Government of China, that is, the Communist regime.

Who does the representative of India expect to be the one to do the job of disarming 500,000 troops of the Republic of China? Certainly the other members of the United Nations which to date have placed fewer troops in Korea to resist Communist aggression on that Republic than the United States has to date suffered casualties are not "the mice that can bell the cat."

It is my strong belief that the more than 9,000,000 people of Free China now on the island of Formosa will bitterly resist being trussed up and delivered into the hands of a Communist tyranny. It is also my strong belief that the more than 500,000 men constituting the army, navy, and air force of Formosa will bitterly resist any attempt to take them into Communist slavery. They know, as we all must know, that the delivery of this island into the hands of the Communists will result in one of the greatest blood baths in history.

For that reason I believe that, with or without help from the free world, the armed forces and the people of Free China on Formosa will resist from the air, from the sea, on the beaches and in the mountains any effort to deliver them over to the Communists.

Nor will the free people of China agree to place their liberty in the hands of the United Nations as a defense force while they disarm themselves. They have seen that, with the exception of the United States of America, all of the rest of the members of the United Nations combined have not sent to Korea for the purpose of resisting Communist aggression against that Republic, as many troops as the Republic of China offered to send—33,000—within a few days of the plea for help. They cannot be expected, nor can any other free nation of the world, put its confidence now in either the military capacity or the moral leadership of the United Nations to resist Communist aggression. It would be helpful if the State Department could give a little clearer explanation as to why our representative, Mr. Austin, voted in favor of this latest proposal.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

A VOTE FOR BLACKMAIL—EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, also I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Vote for Blackmail," published in the Washington Daily News of today.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A VOTE FOR BLACKMAIL

The United Nations now stands ready to reward aggression by offering to give Formosa and China's seat in the UN to the Chinese Reds in return for a cease-fire order in Korea.

The old League of Nations had some sordid chapters in its brief history because of its cowardly retreats from aggression in Manchuria and Ethiopia. But it merely looked the other way without condoning aggression by paying it tribute.

The latest UN act is one of infamy.

The UN cannot long survive this base betrayal of the very purpose for which it was created. The memory of every soldier who has died in Korea fighting under its flag will rise to haunt it. The day Red China is seated in the Security Council this country should walk out. That much is due our honored dead.

No nation can have any faith in the idea of collective security as it is adminstered by the UN, because if it will sell out one government, it will sell out others. Indeed, if the Reds accept the bribe which has been offered them, what more can the organization be considered than a catspaw for aggression?

CHINA'S BETRAYAL

Protesting against the betrayal of Nationalist China, which is a member of the organization, its delegate, Dr. T. F. Tsiang, said that Formosa was being treated as though it were a No Man's Land.

Actually, he said, Formosa is the home of "Free China," defended by an army of a half million men, the largest single unit of power against Communist imperialist aggression in the Far East. The proposed peace talks with the Reds, he added, pose only one question:

"How do you want Formosa, rare, medium, or well done?"

That is not funny.

The lives of 7,500,000 people, including permanent residents of the island and the refugees from the mainland, will be in jeopardy if Formosa is handed over to the mercies of the Peiping Reds. Many of these people on Formosa have been branded as war criminals for no other reason than that they have opposed communism.

Thus we treat our friends—the first government to offer its assistance when we took up arms in South Korea. And we are doing this at the urging of India, which proclaimed its neutrality in that crucial hour.

VOICE OF FREE ASIA

How will the free nations of Asia react to this perfidious act by the great powers? That question was answered on the floor of the United Nations by Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, of the Philippines.

"How far can the United Nations keep retreating from established, sound moral positions without courting final disaster?" he asked.

"A retreat in the course of battle is understandable and sometimes inevitable, but a retreat from right principles while a battle is being waged for those principles cannot be justified on any ground whatever.

"My country knows the nameless terror and agony of war as few countries around this table do. Therefore we understand the anxious desire of many delegates to exhaust every possibility of avoiding a general war. But we also know there is at least one thing that is worse than war itself, and that is the degrading enslavement that would surely follow an abject surrender before the threats of a fanatic and implacable aggressor."

The United Nations was saying to Peiping, he charged, "You may stop hitting and killing my boys so that we can discuss how to reward you with the gift of Formosa and a seat in the United Nations."

General Romulo warned the United Nations it would lose its reason for being if it resorted to appeasement in this situation.

"We have heard moving appeals to the free nations of the world to close ranks," he said. "But such appeals cannot be met by an admission of weakness and abject surrender. The march of Communist aggression cannot be arrested by a policy of moral retreat and surrender."

Indeed, doesn't the betrayal of Nationalist China and Korea put every free nation on notice that its best hope lies in making peace with Moscow on the best terms it can?

OUR SORRY ROLE

Where did the United States stand when the roll was called on this unhappy occasion?

Ours was a craven "Me, too" vote.

Warren R. Austin, the American delegate, supported the proposal to buy off the Reds, explaining that he did so in the interest of "unity." Afterward, it was explained that Mr. Austin did not expect the Reds to accept the proposition, and then he would be free to revive his resolution condemning them as aggressors. Would he add as a second count of his indictment their refusal to accept a bribe?

We assume Mr. Austin was carrying out orders of Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

Nothing less than immediate resignation of both men could in any way relieve this country of even a small part of the embarrassment caused by the indefensible position our Government has taken.

The administration first lost the initiative in the UN by failing to press for forthright action against Red China, then joined Britain and the other appeasement advocates in offering to pay blackmail.

That act is a virtual admission that the whole Korean undertaking was a miscalculation, and that Red China was right and the United States was wrong. The appeasement offer to which our UN spokesman consented cannot be appraised on any other basis.

We don't believe Congress or the American people will buy any part of it. They cannot forget the case of—

PRIVATE (FIRST CLASS) BROWN

Who hasn't been seen since September 4.

That day Pfc Melvin Brown, of Mahaffey, Pa., stood atop a 50-foot wall at Kasan, Korea, and beat back the enemy single-handed, while his platoon regrouped to repel the attackers.

Private (first class) Brown fired his rifle until he ran out of ammunition.

Private (first class) Brown hurled grenades until he ran out of grenades.

They still kept coming up that wall.

Private (first class) Brown wasn't a man to let a little thing like no ammunition thwart him. He took his entrenching shovel and bashed those Reds over the head as they came up, delivering skull crushers with his shovel to a dozen of them.

Last week at the White House President Truman presented a Congressional Medal of Honor to the father of Private (first class) Brown.

"Outstanding personal bravery * * *" the citation reads.

And a good solid American brand of personal bravery that Private (first class) Brown delivered atop that lonesome wall in Korea. * * *

Private (first class) Brown was in a position where he had to call a spade a weapon.

Countless hordes of Chinese Reds have swept down on the Private (first class) Browns in Korea.

Our leaders and allies are not in the position they put Private (first class) Brown in, but they should be statesmen enough to call a spade a spade.

JOINT CHIEFS NOT CONSULTED—ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "Joint Chiefs Not Consulted," written by David Lawrence, and published in today's Washington Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOINT CHIEFS NOT CONSULTED

(By David Lawrence)

The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff were not consulted before instructions were sent by the State Department here to Ambassador Warren Austin to vote for the United Nations resolution proposing to Red China a cease fire in Korea. This means that neither General MacArthur nor General Ridgway nor anybody else in the United Nations' forces was consulted as to the effect of the proposal on morale of the troops or as to the desirability of a cease-fire step at this time.

Whether all this was by accident or design has not been revealed. It could be that the State Department did not wish to embarrass the military by asking it to concur when the position of our forces in Korea is so unfavorable. To have asked the military might have posed the dilemma in which an affirmative answer could mean an unwillingness to keep on fighting while a negative answer might be construed as blocking the Department of State's policies.

This indifference to the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff creates nevertheless a belief that high-level policy is rather loosely made in the American Government today.

There is considerable anxiety here in military circles about the possible consequences of the American support for the cease-fire proposal. It would not occasion much surprise if Red China accepts the United Nations plan. In fact if the Chinese Communist leaders have any sense left at all and are really not trying to enlarge the area of the conflict they will grab the United Nations proposal. It gives them a rare opportunity to confuse their opponents.

The mere fact that Russia voted against the resolution in the United Nations does not mean, as some reports have surmised, that it is doomed to be rejected by the Peiping government. The strategy might well have been planned for the Red Chinese to accept the plan in the face of ostensible opposition from the Russians as this would tend to foster the impression that the Red Chinese authorities in their diplomacy are truly independent of Moscow.

The advantages to the Red Chinese in favor of accepting the cease-fire plan are that they get what amounts to recognition in a future international conference, and they are also promised an opportunity to sit down with a commission from the United Nations and trade and negotiate about Formosa, and admission to the United Nations.

This does not necessarily signify that the American Government is ready to support a change in its Formosa policy or in its attitude toward admission of Red China. But it does raise this issue: If the other nations of the commission outvote America the United States will be in the position of seeming to wish to resume hostilities and wage war unless it makes important concessions to Red China. This is a severe handicap to America in the negotiations.

Anxiety over what the American Government has done by its support of the cease-fire proposal extends beyond military circles here. Privately, many Members of Congress are even more worried about it. They think the United States has been entrapped and that America will find herself outmaneuvered the moment a cease fire is accepted.

To all those who exhibit concern—and some of the Members of Congress have been in communication with Ambassador Austin about it—word has come back not to worry because the cease-fire resolution isn't going to be accepted by Red China anyway.

So the situation comes down to this: Many influential persons in Washington are hoping the cease-fire proposal will be turned down but they fear it will not be and that the American people may come to feel that the sacrifices made in Korea have been of no avail despite the 40,000 casualties. Trouble is then seen ahead for our rearmament program in Congress.

If, on the other hand, the cease fire is turned down by Red China and fighting continues, the situation cannot be less grave even if our troops are withdrawn or forced out of Korea. If that contingency arises, it would seem that the whole case will turn on whether the United Nations has branded the Communist Chinese as aggressors. Once branded that way, some other steps will have to be taken by members of the United Nations to punish Red China.

If the United Nations refuses to vote for a resolution branding Communist China as an aggressor, the stock of the United Nations will go down to zero with American public opinion. It will become necessary then for the United States to decide for itself whether or what military measures shall be taken on its own to blockade China, including Hong Kong, and to carry on an air bombardment until Red China makes amends for her aggression in Korea. Conversely, the demand to do nothing more and keep our troops from both Asia and Europe will grow immeasurably stronger in Congress.

FACTS OF THE KOREAN WAR IGNORED—ARTICLE BY CONSTANTINE BROWN

Mr. KNOWLAND. I further ask, Mr. President, that in connection with the various matters I have just requested to have inserted in the RECORD, there be inserted at this point in the body of the RECORD, an article entitled, "Facts of the Korean War Ignored," written by Constantine Brown and published in the Washington Evening Star of today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FACTS OF KOREAN WAR IGNORED

(By Constantine Brown)

There are many in this country and on the other side of the Atlantic who apparently want to deceive themselves, for they refuse to recognize the stark fact that the unprovoked attack by the Chinese armies on the United Nations forces in Korea was an act of war.

Because there has been no formal declaration of hostilities they refuse to accept the fact that we are now at war. They overlook the fact that dictators do not declare wars, they wage them.

In this light the attempts of the British and Commonwealth Prime Ministers to negotiate a surrender by the UN to the Chinese appear ludicrous. The representatives of these powers stated last Friday that they would welcome any feasible arrangement for a frank exchange of views with Prime Minister Stalin and Mao Tze-tung.

They added that "We should, in the name of common humanity, make a supreme effort to see clearly into each other's hearts and minds."

We have failed to restore peace in Korea. Moscow took advantage of the effort of the UN members to live up to the principles of their Charter. By unleashing the Chinese Communists at a time when the North Korean aggressors had been soundly beaten, Russia wantonly launched world war III.

We have lost lives and men in that campaign. But the set back suffered by our forces is nowhere as great as that suffered by the British in 1940, when they were compelled to evacuate France at Dunkerque. Nor is our position nearly as bad as that we faced in 1942, when the Japanese captured the Philippines and the large American force which was stuck there.

Not a cry was raised in England during and after Dunkerque demanding that Prime Minister Churchill seek a "frank exchange of views" with Hitler and Mussolini and make a supreme effort to see into their hearts and minds. The British and Americans knew only too well what they contained. And Stalin and Mao are no better than their predecessors.

The French, who refused to continue the fight from Africa, were labeled traitors to the common cause. Yet the treaty between France and Britain was no more binding than the United Nations Charter.

Nobody suggested that President Roosevelt sit down and have a heart-to-heart talk with Emperor Hirohito after the American and Philippines Armies were defeated by the Japanese. Any such suggestion then would have been an act of treason.

The fact that in both these instances there had been a formal declaration of war on the part of the democratic nations against the aggressors does not change the present picture in the least. In those days the democratic nations had the manhood to answer totalitarian aggression with formal war.

The democracies, which claim to be determined to oppose aggressive Communist imperialism, do not seem to have the same strength today. At the present moment British diplomacy is striving to persuade the American Government to accept the cease-fire proposal sponsored by the Asiatic and Arab countries, even if it means, in fact, a surrender to the Chinese Communists.

Until a week ago the administration in Washington was determined to accept no such solution, unless the Chinese withdrew their forces from Korea. But under the continuous hammering of the British and Indian Governments, it appears that there has been a weakening of this stand insofar as American diplomats here and at Lake Success are concerned. They are leaning toward acceptance of these proposals in a form sufficiently modified to save the face of the American Government.

DENIAL BY SENATOR TAFT OF STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO HIM BY TIME MAGAZINE

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 minute, in order to make a denial of a statement in the nature of an alleged quotation appearing in Time magazine. It will not take me longer than 1 minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, Time magazine, in its latest issue, that of January 15, 1951, in dealing with my speech of last Friday, said:

> But the most obvious flaw in the whole Taft position was his hopeful prophecy that Russia would not attack the United States. It justified a look at his record as a military prophet. In February 1941 TAFT predicted with equal certainty: "It is simply fantastic to suppose there is danger of an attack on the United States by Japan."

In the first place, I did not make any prophecy; I merely pointed out that that was one of the considerations on which we must proceed. In the second place, I never made any such statement, at any time, as is here put in quotation marks opposite my name.

This particular allegation was first made in the CIO in the 1944 campaign. I denied it then. It appeared in John Gunther's book in 1946 or 1947, and I denied it then. It was published as part of an article entitled "The Record of ROBERT A. TAFT," in the CIO pamphlet which was gotten out in the recent campaign. I denied it then. All that would have been necessary was for them to ask me whether the statement was true. There is no reported statement of that kind to be found anywhere. One man, a political opponent, claims he heard me say it in 1941. I did not say it, because I did not believe it. I always took the position as to the Far East that I thought Secretary Stimson's policy might very easily provoke an attack by Japan, and that I hoped he would get away with the kind of bluff we were making toward Japan. But I thought that we could not be certain, and I did not know whether or not it was likely to produce an attack.

In any event, this particular statement has been repeated so often that I should like to put on record in the Senate the fact that it is absolutely untrue.

ALASKAN STATEHOOD

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a telegram I have received from Anchorage, Alaska, and my answer thereto, and to make a 1 minute clarifying statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Georgia is recognized for a 1-minute clarifying statement.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in the course of the debate on the Alaskan statehood bill, I stated on the floor of the Senate that I was opposed to statehood for Alaska and Hawaii at this time, because, in view of the critical situation in world affairs, these areas might be first attacked. I did not believe that Alaska should have statehood now, as it might adversely affect the defense of Alaska. I pointed out that it was found necessary to place Hawaii under military law during World War II and that if Hawaii had been a State it would have raised a serious question of the rights of a State.

My statement that I was not prepared to defend States' rights in the case of Alaska at this time has been twisted—I think deliberately—to make it appear that I was unwilling to defend Alaska from foreign aggression. My entire argument was that Alaska and Hawaii could both be better defended from the impending dangers if they remained as Territories. This telegram from the Young Democratic Club of Alaska, and my answer thereto, should clear up that matter, and I therefore ask that these two telegrams be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA, January 11, 1951.
Hon. Senator RICHARD RUSSELL, of Georgia,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Young Democratic Club of Alaska unanimously and vehemently protest your stand jeopardizing entire Pacific northwestern America in assuming United States not obligated to defend Alaska, we demand immediate retraction your statement for congressional records.

YOUNG DEMOCRATIC CLUB OF ALASKA,
ZEBE HARRIS, President.

JANUARY 11, 1951.

ZEBE HARRIS,
President, Young Democratic Club of Alaska, Anchorage, Alaska:

Retel. I have always sought to defend the constitutional and political rights of the sovereign States against the encroachments of Federal power. I also fully recognize the constitutional obligation of the Federal Government to protect the States and Territories and all of its citizens from foreign aggression. The fact that you and the members of your organization do not understand the distinction between these two principles should explain the doubt existing in the minds of many Members of Congress as to the wisdom of admitting Alaska to statehood at this time. I am happy to assure you that I shall insist upon the defense of the Territory and people of Alaska against any foreign foe exactly to the same extent that I insist upon the defense of any State of the Union and its people. I have never held or expressed any other view.

RICHARD B. RUSSELL.

CHARLES D. WATKINS—TRIBUTE BY SENATOR CAIN

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], I ask unanimous consent that there may be placed in the RECORD a statement by him in the nature of a eulogy regarding a retiring newspaper correspondent, Mr. Charles D. Watkins.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

For the past 13 years the people of the great Northwest, including those living in my State of Washington, have been kept abreast of the activities of their Senators and Congressmen through the news stories as presented by the able correspondents in the press galleries. All do their job of reporting ably and objectively.

Among these men and women of whom I speak, is a correspondent who has served us from the Northwest and our constituencies, with undeviating faithfulness to the tenets laid down through the years by his profession. He has never allowed his personal emotions or opinions to influence his writings. His loyalty to his employer and to his profession has never been questioned. He has never been known to sacrifice his integrity in furtherance of his career. His kindness and wisdom have saved many of us from grievous error. His advice when, and only when, requested, has been readily, wisely, and freely given.

In the 4 years during which the junior Senator from the State of Washington has served in the Capitol, he has come to depend on Mr. Charles D. Watkins, Associated Press correspondent for the Northwest for the past 13 years, as a valued friend. Last Saturday marked a milestone long anticipated, no doubt, by "Doc" Watkins, but one that we, whom he has served so well, deeply regret. Last Saturday "Doc" retired as an Associated Press correspondent after 40 years as a newspaper writer. The junior Senator from Washington joins with the hundreds of "Doc's" friends in the Congress, among his coworkers, and his thousands of readers, in wishing him Godspeed, and in expressing to him our deep feeling of thankfulness that we have had the privilege of knowing and associating with him, an able newsman, an invaluable friend, and a gentleman.

AMERICAN ECONOMY—STATEMENTS BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks which I had intended to make today together with a statement I issued on November 2, 1950, calling for a more energetic anti-inflation program.

There being no objection, the remarks and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The American economy is being crippled by inflation, and I rise to protest the inertia and lack of decisiveness on the part of the administration which has allowed the cost of living to rise to unprecedented heights.

The issue of inflation is one which transcends political partisanship. It is one which affects the welfare and the security of every American family, and cannot be ignored.

I have had an opportunity over the week end to study in detail the economic report of the President and the report of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. I am constrained to say that seldom have I seen such cogent, forceful, and eloquent economic analysis end with such disappointing and flat conclusions.

Now is the time to impose immediate and rigid price controls. I called for such controls as early as July 20, following the Korean crisis. I repeated that request on July 23, urging a roll-back of prices to June 25. On August 7 I presented an eight-point program to curb inflation. Finally, on November 2, after spending 3 months visiting and talking with the people of my State, my conviction was reaffirmed that immediate action was necessary, and I called for a temporary price stop of from 4 to 6 months until such time as indirect controls could be made more effective.

Today, with the specter of an inadequate tax program and with inadequate price controls, I repeat with all the urgency at my command that our Nation's welfare and our Nation's security call for action now without any further delay.

The American people cannot understand the confusion and inexplicable lack of an anti-inflation program from Washington. I, for one, agree with the American people that the delay is inexcusable. I do not know for certain who is to blame, and do not care much. I have been told, however, in a private conversation with a member of the Federal Reserve Board that the Federal Reserve Board is itself one of the bottlenecks in achieving an effective anti-inflation program.

Furthermore, the differences of opinion between our Director of Price Stabilization and our Director of Economic Stabilization have also seriously damaged our economy. The fact that those differences have become public is deplorable. I simply cannot understand the shortsightedness which allows the word of a possible price freeze to reach the public before the price freeze is imposed. Every time word of such a possible plan reaches the public, industrial and consumer prices rise, and the American consumer takes it on the chin.

This lack of an anti-inflation program will also have very serious repercussions in the field of labor-management relations. We cannot expect labor-management peace or effective wage stabilization controls while the cost of living goes up. The working men and women, the pensioner, the white-collar worker, and the American farmer are the victims of this Washington ivory-tower attitude.

I warn the American Congress that unless we act to halt inflation now, we will be faced with serious industrial strife.

I, for one, am prepared to call for congressional action and investigation in the next few days if some relief is not provided.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR HUMPHREY CALLING FOR MORE ENERGETIC ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM, NOVEMBER 2, 1950

America today faces a serious economic crisis. We are emerging from the Korean action with military victory for the United Nations and for our own Armed Forces. Korea has taught us the lesson that our Nation must be geared to a long-range and ever constant defense alertness. This will call for an annual output of anywhere from $350,000,000,000 to $500,000,000,000 by 1955, depending upon international developments.

Our Korean experience has taught us one other lesson. We have learned that our national economy is so much of an interrelated unit that irresponsibility by any of us has immediate and serious repercussions for all of us. In the 2 months following the Korean invasion, for example, from June 15 to August 15 of this year, retail home furnishings prices increased more than 2 percent. Retail food prices are today 2.7 percent above the June 15 level. Manufacturers' prices are today 8 percent above the pre-Korean level, and are rising steadily. As a result of these and other price developments with which the American housewife is thoroughly familiar, we are today facing a severe inflationary crisis.

This price burden is particularly great because of the fact that we are moving into an inflationary spiral from an already too-high price level. From 1944, the wartime peak, to the first half of 1950 the average weekly buying power of the wage earner fell more than 7 percent.

The problem we face is not only one of upward movement of prices, but also one of an inflationary psychology. Businessmen are acting on the assumption that their costs will be higher and are setting their prices accordingly. Consumers are acting on the same premise. In spite of the fact, that the production of civilian goods is still extremely high, shortages exist. Automobiles have been produced at the weekly rate of 175,000 or more since early June, but they do not appear too plentiful; steel is being produced at the highest rate in our history, but mills are sold out; refrigerators, washing machines, and other consumer durable goods are being produced in vast quantities, but immediate delivery is nevertheless rare.

Nor are future prospects any brighter for the American consumer. Continued upward pressures are evident throughout our economy. The normal seasonal pattern of declining meat prices which usually affects the market at this time every year, will soon be at an end. In fact, processor, distributor, and retail prices have been out of line with the normal seasonal price decline of wholesale agricultural commodities. The relatively stable seasonal process in livestock, meats, and grains has not been passed on to the consumer, who today pays higher prices for meats and breads. By the spring of 1951 we will be faced with further sharp increase in food prices unless immediate and positive action is taken.

The retail market will also be further affected by the current rises in industrial prices. Tin, rubber, copper, burlap, and lubricating oils are continuing to show rises. Smaller producers have recently raised prices on some steel products from $3 per ton to $12 per ton. Since Korea, the prices of textiles have risen 19 percent, chemical 14 percent, and building materials 10 percent. No single important group of commodities has failed to advance. The general index of primary market prices is 5 percent higher than it has ever been before. On the commodity exchanges, industrial materials traded on organized markets are averaging one-third above the pre-Korean level, with some commodities like rubber and tallow more than doubling in price.

Furthermore, many retailers are today being billed for "reorder" merchandise at higher prices and are passing those added costs on to the consumer, even for items already in stock. Many producers and distributors, fearful of future price controls, have increased their prices for no valid reason and with no justification other than a desire for increased profits and a desire to keep their prices higher under any control regulations which may be forthcoming.

To the American consumer, therefore, the picture is one of high prices, continued high prices, and an outlook of still higher prices. By the spring of 1951, not only will food prices be higher unless curtailed, but there will also be sharp increases in apparel and house furnishings where manufacturers' prices have already increased.

As early as July 20, I pointed to the dangers faced by our economy as a result of the Korean crisis, and asked for the abandonment of business-as-usual attitudes and practices. I said "unchecked inflation can be as disastrous as invasion" and I urged that those "who raise prices to take advantage of a critical international situation are guilty of undermining the strength and productivity of our country." "I called for an immediate excess-profits tax, for measures necessary to regulate prices," and for "an adequate distribution of goods and services."

Again, on July 23, I urged the Congress to act "immediately to halt rising prices and irresponsible profiteering now taking place at the expense of the American people.

High prices, I said, were founded on no basis of economic fact. I urged that prices be rolled back to June 25.

On August 7 I presented an eight-point program to curb inflation, calling for the authority to impose price ceilings, priorities and production controls, the allocation of resources, manpower allocation, rent control, tax increases, wage controls, and rationing where necessary.

It is today time to begin imposing these controls without further delay.

The administration has so far moved cautiously to meet the problem of growing inflation. It plans to depend on indirect controls for the long economic pull we face. This is consistent with the administration's desire to preserve free enterprise in our economy. It is also consistent with the understanding that the crisis we face today is different from the crisis we faced after Pearl Harbor. We had then an immediate goal in mind and prepared for a well-defined all-out military effort. An analogy fits the situation. If one Olympic athlete enters a 3-mile marathon and another the 100-yard dash, they both need to make an all-out effort. If the short-distance runner runs the first hundred yards in 9 seconds, he will probably win his race; but if the long-distance runner races the first hundred yards in 9 seconds, he will tire quickly and end his long-distance marathon last and not first. We must adjust our all-out effort to the nature of the race.

As part of its program to prevent inflation, our Government has depended a great deal upon credit controls. Governors of the Federal Reserve System in August, as a first step, required Federal Reserve banks in leading cities to raise the discount rate from 1½ percent to 1¾ percent and thus make loans more expensive.

In early September the Federal Reserve Board of Governors recreated the wartime device known as regulation W, designed to discourage installment buying and thus hamper consumers from using future income to purchase scarce goods. This regulation did not prove tough enough. The total consumer credit outstanding at the end of August was nearly $21,000,000,000, more than twice as much as there was in either 1941 or 1948. Most of this was installment credit, charge accounts, and loans.

The result of the new regulation was that down payments have been increased to 25 percent on television sets, radios, and other major durables, instead of 15 percent. Balances are to be paid in 15 months instead of 18 months. Credit regulations were tightened a few weeks ago on automobiles and other goods, running as low as $50.

Real estate construction credit has also been regulated by the new credit controls. To buy a house now, higher down payments are needed. The American consumer, therefore, cannot borrow as much today as he once could. Less new money will therefore be created which will help prevent inflation.

There is no question but that severe credit controls can be effective, but they take time. They also have certain inherent defects, particularly as they apply to items such as housing. They penalize lower income groups and they therefore ration commodities not on the basis of need but on the basis of available cash.

Credit controls in housing, therefore, must be accompanied by immediate rent control. I therefore plan to urge the Congress to reimpose rent controls, not only on old housing units where there are shortages, but also on new units. Housing credits will create strong pressure for increased rents, and rent control is essential to protect tenants. Under the new credit regulations, instead of 1,200,000 new houses being built in 1951, only 800,000 will be built.

Credit controls must also be supplemented by a steep progressive tax structure. An equitable excess profits tax must be enacted when the Congress reconvenes in a few weeks. From the 1944 wartime profit peak of ten billion eight hundred million after taxes, corporate profits further increased to twenty billion nine hundred million after taxes in 1948. During the first half of 1950, corporate profits after taxes were at the annual rate of nineteen billion seven hundred million. By the end of this year and as a result of wartime profits, corporate profits after taxes may reach $23,000,000,000.

There is no justification for excess profits in wartime. Equality of sacrifice, basic good sense and our economic needs demand an excess-profits tax. It is also necessary that existing loopholes in our tax laws be closed. In September of this year, I led a fight on the floor of the Senate to eliminate the inequities and special provisions in our tax laws which now take the form of privileged treatment to owners of oil wells and those in the higher income groups who can take advantage of capital gains treatment. These and other abuses must be eliminated and I plan to increase my efforts in that direction.

There is still room for additional credit controls. One of the plans being discussed in Washington is to require member banks of the Federal Reserve System to increase their reserves still further which could hold back from the flow of money in our economy about $2,500,000,000. A further tightening of installment credit is possible if necessary. We remember that during the war, buyers had a 12-month limit to complete payment instead of the present 15. Charge accounts may be brought under control also.

The President under the Defense Production Act of 1950 has appointed an Economic Stabilization Administrator, Mr. Alan Valentine. The Department of Labor has begun a detailed study of our manpower needs and resources. The Department of Commerce has already instituted some priority allocations, and the Department of Interior has the responsibility over our natural resources. The Department of Agriculture is now developing a farm program to meet our defense needs. The National Security Resources Board is studying further plans for tooling up our resources to meet the economic problems we face.

A more dynamic and immediate program is vital however.

1. A price administrator should be appointed immediately so that we can begin an administrative tooling up period for whatever price-controls may be required to protect the American economy.

2. A wage stabilization board should begin operations to relate wages and demands for wage increases to our over-all economic needs.

3. Industry committees should promptly be appointed to establish direct controls. All segments of industry, small business and big business, should be represented on the committee.

4. Congress should reimpose and strengthen our rent-control laws as soon as it reconvenes, not only on old housing units but on new units as well. Authority to establish controls on decontrolled units should be granted.

5. An excess profits tax should be enacted, retroactive to July 1, 1950; tax loopholes should be eliminated; and the inequitable tax reductions passed by the Eightieth Congress should be repealed. We must place our economy on a pay-as-you-go basis as much as possible. The Congress when it reconvenes should begin raising an additional ten to fifteen billion dollars necessary to achieve that end.

6. Congress should act to correct the defects in existing legislation, provide subsidy authority where roll-backs are required in order to stabilize the cost of living and thus allow consumer food prices to be directly controlled if necessary.

7. Congress should provide the authority to regulate trading in futures on the commodity exchange market. It is grossly unfair to ask consumers to deprive themselves of essentials and at the same time allow and encourage speculative purchasing on the commodity market.

8. Credit restrictions should be imposed on commercial construction mortgage credit similar to the credit restrictions now in effect on residential construction. This is both equitable and economically necessary.

9. Our consumer-credit restrictions should be under constant scrutiny to determine whether they are operating equitably and also whether they are sufficient to keep inflation under control.

10. We are faced with a problem of expanding bank credit which encourages inventory accumulation and futures buying. The reserve requirements should be increased and the open market operations of the Federal Reserve System should be directed to restricting the extension of commercial-bank credit.

11. Controls over special-problem commodities should be imposed immediately. In particular, these controls should apply to certain import commodities, such as rubber, wool, burlap, tin, and chemicals, and the United States should begin negotiating with exporting nations in regard to those commodities and their prices.

12. Finally and urgently, pending the effectiveness and the application of the above controls, a "price stop" should be instituted which would provide a temporary price ceiling to last from 4 to 6 months. In the absence of an effective tax program, some form of direct price control is essential. The hard fact is that it may be 6 months before indirect controls can become fully effective. A full program of indirect controls cannot be developed quickly and it will be some months before a new tax bill goes into effect. I urge, therefore, that in the period between now and the time indirect controls take hold, general temporary controls be established. By then we should be administratively prepared to undertake any further, new, or more selective controls which may be called for.

This proposal is not intended as a price freeze or a strait-jacket for industry. It is rather a means of stabilizing prices. During the period of this temporary—and I emphasize temporary—"stop," the price administrator would be authorized and directed to grant exemptions where the public interest would not suffer or where such exemptions are necessary for defense purposes. My essential objective is to prevent runaway inflation until such time as indirect controls, which all of us prefer, are made fully effective.

Increased prices and inflation not only operate to the disadvantage of the consumer and the general public, but also severely affect the operations of our defense effort and the Federal budget. Increased prices for materials basic to our defense operations mean drastically increased Government expenditures and high taxes to meet those expenditures.

An example of the effect of price increases can be seen from the following facts:

Prices on some rockets are increased so we can now buy only 870 rockets for the same amount that would have bought 1,000 before Korea; walkie-talkie radio set prices have increased so the money that would buy 1,000 before Korea will now buy only 660; 770 bazookas can now be bought for the pre-Korean price of 1,000; 870 1-ton trailers cost the same as 1,000 did before Korea; 770 rifles for the pre-Korean price of 1,000. In aircraft procurement price increases have cost our Government $360,000,000, or the equivalent of 750 F–86's. In 1944, at the height of the war, we would have equipped an infantry division for $14,500,000; now the cost is $74,000,000. We could then equip an armored division for $30,000,000; today the cost is $199,000,000.

To impose temporary controls now will save the American taxpayer and the American consumer untold millions of dollars.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, if the routine business has been finished, I desire to make a brief statement regarding assignments to committees, and I should like to have the committee assignments made, so that the Senate may transact business.

In that connection, let me say that we are willing to have a session tomorrow and the next day and the next day, if necessary, in order that all Senators who wish to make speeches may do so, but of course they cannot all speak at the same time. I hope that Senators will not try to obtain recognition until we can dispose of the assignments to the committees. I send to the desk, in behalf of the majority, the committee assignments approved by the majority.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. A large number of Senators have indicated their desire to address the Senate, but the question of committee assignments is a privileged matter, and the Chair thinks it would take precedence over speeches.

As Senators know, the present occupant of the Chair, since he has been presiding over the Senate, has tried not to make commitments in advance as to whom he would recognize on the floor, for the obvious reason that the rule requires the recognition of the first Senator who addresses the Chair. In many cases, where more than one Senator addresses the Chair, it is sometimes impossible to tell who first addressed the Chair; but the Chair will recognize Senators in as orderly a way as possible, though of course we all understand that it is possible to recognize but one Senator at a time. The present occupant of the Chair has found that when he commits himself in advance to recognize some Senator a day or two ahead, or on some future date, he nearly always gets into trouble about it, because matters arise when that day comes which make it impossible to fulfill the promise. So the Chair can only do his best as situations arise. But this report is a privileged matter, and is entitled to consideration.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, is it the desire of the Presiding Officer that the two lists be read in this connection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the opinion of the Chair that that should be done.

Mr. WHERRY. In behalf of the minority, I send to the desk the minority list of committee assignments. I wish to inform the Chair, however, that at the conclusion of the reading of the lists, and before the order is agreed to, I should like to make one or perhaps several motions in regard to the names appearing on the lists.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the assignments to committees on behalf of the majority and the minority.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the following shall constitute the standing committees of the Senate of the Eighty-second Congress:

On Agriculture and Forestry: Messrs. Ellender, chairman, Hoey, Johnston of South Carolina, Holland, Anderson, Eastland, Humphrey, Aiken, Young, Thye, Kem, Hickenlooper, and Mundt.

On Appropriations: Messrs. McKellar, chairman, Hayden, Russell, McCarran, O'Mahoney, Chavez, Maybank, Ellender, Hill, Kilgore, McClellan, Bridges, Ferguson, Wherry, Cordon, Saltonstall, Young, Knowland, Thye, Ecton, and McCarthy.

On Armed Services: Messrs. Russell, chairman, Byrd, Chapman, Johnson of Texas, Kefauver, Hunt, Stennis, Bridges, Saltonstall, Morse, Knowland, Cain, and Flanders.

On Banking and Currency: Messrs. Maybank, chairman, Fulbright, Robertson, Sparkman, Frear, Douglas, Long, Capehart, Bricker, Ives, Schoeppel, Dirksen, and Bennett.

On the District of Columbia: Messrs. Neely, chairman, Johnston of South Carolina, Kefauver, Hunt, Pastore, Clements, Smith of North Carolina, Case, Butler of Maryland, Welker, Bennett, and Vandenberg.

On Expenditures in the Executive Departments: Messrs. McClelland, chairman, Hoey, O'Conor, Humphrey, Benton, Robertson, Monroney, McCarthy, Mundt, Mrs. Smith of Maine, Schoeppel, Dworshak, and Nixon.

On Finance: Messrs. George, chairman, Connally, Byrd, Johnson of Colorado, Hoey, Kerr, Frear, Millikin, Taft, Butler of Nebraska, Brewster, Martin, and Williams.

On Foreign Relations: Messrs. Connally, chairman, George, Green, McMahon, Fulbright, Sparkman, Gillette, Vandenberg, Wiley, Smith of New Jersey, Hickenlooper, Lodge, and Tobey.

On Interior and Insular Affairs: Messrs. O'Mahoney, chairman, Murray, McFarland, Anderson, Lehman, Long, Smathers, Butler of Nebraska, Millikin, Cordon, Ecton, Malone, and Watkins.

On Interstate and Foreign Commerce: Messrs. Johnson of Colorado, chairman, McFarland, Magnuson, McMahon, O'Conor, Johnson of Texas, Hunt, Tobey, Brewster, Capehart, Bricker, Williams, and Kem.

On the Judiciary: Messrs. McCarran, chairman, Kilgore, Eastland, Magnuson, O'Conor, Kefauver, Smith of North Carolina, Wiley, Langer, Ferguson, Jenner, Watkins, and Hendrickson.

On Labor and Public Welfare: Messrs. Murray, chairman, Hill, Neely, Douglas, Humphrey, Lehman, Pastore, Taft, Aiken, Smith of New Jersey, Morse, Ives, and Nixon.

On Post Office and Civil Service: Messrs. Johnston of South Carolina, chairman, McKellar, Neely, Pastore, Clements, Monroney, Smathers, Langer, Carlson, Dirksen, Welker, and Butler of Maryland.

On Public Works, Messrs, Chavez, chairman, McClellan, Holland, Stennis, Chapman, Kerr, Hennings, Cain, Martin, Malone, Dworshak, Carlson, and Case.

On Rules and Administration: Messrs. Hayden, chairman, Green, Gillette, Benton, Clements, Monroney, Hennings, Wherry, Lodge, Jenner, Hendrickson, Flanders, and Mrs. Smith of Maine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the order providing for committee assignments.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I intend to make a motion which has to do with increasing the number of members of committees. In order to cooperate fully with the majority leader, who is anxious to get the Senate organized, I ask unanimous consent that if any debate is involved in the discussion of the motion, which I am sure will not take long if it is confined to the motion, it be upon the motion itself, which has to do with increased committee membership.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that if any debate takes place on the resolution, it be confined to the resolution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in the debate each Senator be limited to 15 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, that forces the Senator from Nebraska to make his motion.

I desire to say to the distinguished majority leader and also to the President of the Senate that it is not the intention of the minority leader to delay the organization of the Senate. What I have to say can be said in 15 minutes, and we can proceed with the orderly reorganization of the Senate without any difficulty. I was asking for cooperation in doing that very thing. On this side we have done our level best voluntarily to comply with the assignments to committees. The last thing we can do, in order to satisfy those Members who are not pleased with their assignments, is to make one more effort. I had hoped that this could be done in an orderly way, and for that reason I have made the unanimous-consent requests.

In the absence of such cooperation, I send to the desk a motion and ask that it be read and that the Senate proceed to consider it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in the paragraph designating the members of the Committee on Appropriations, to insert after the word "appropriations" a comma and the words "to consist during the Eighty-second Congress of 23 Senators."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there has been no time in our national life when greater responsibilities have been placed upon the committees of Congress.

All are involved in a maze of legislation, which must be studied, not only within its own scope, but as to how it serves the purposes of our national policy in all its ramifications.

Our Nation is fighting a hot war in Korea and a cold war in every other corner of the globe.

There is before the Congress a budget the size of which has not been paralleled in our history, short of an all-out war.
